PREFACE TO THE SIXTH EDITION

Bill Cleveland passed away on September 28, 2006, following years of struggle with leukemia and related complications. Just weeks earlier, Bill had officially retired from the Department of History at Simon Fraser University, where his skill and dedication in the classroom were widely acclaimed.

The first edition of Bill's textbook, published in 1994, concluded with an initial assessment of the significance of the 1991 Gulf War as a major turning point in the modern history of the region. The textbook was revised for republication in 2000, 2004, and 2008. These editions were able to observe more clearly the patterns of continuity and change that had unfolded since the Gulf War, and reflect on both the 2001 al-Qa'ida attacks on the Pentagon and the World Trade Center and the 2003 US invasion of Iraq.

In the fifth edition, published in 2013, a new Part Six, "Challenges to the Existing Order: The Middle East in the 1990s and 2000s," was created to identify more clearly the development of historical trends since the Gulf War: the rise and fall of the Oslo peace process; the development and evolution of Islamist movements and institutions in Turkey, Iran, and Lebanon; the efforts of the United States to assert its hegemony; and the dramatic Arab uprisings of 2011. This sixth edition expands on the regional impact of all of these far-reaching developments. Also new to this edition are the "Key Events" timelines that precede each of the six parts, and the List of Major Rulers that can be found with the Glossary at the end of the book.

This book is intended to introduce Middle Eastern history to students and general readers who have not previously studied the subject. In the pages that follow, the term Middle East refers to the region from Egypt in the west through Iran in the east, and from Turkey in the north to the Arabian Peninsula in the south. Sound arguments exist, perhaps now more than ever, for extending the geographical coverage to include Arab North Africa, the Sudan, and Islamic Afghanistan. However, for purposes of coherence and manageability, this text concentrates on the central Middle East. The primary chronological focus of the book is from the late eighteenth to the early twenty-first centuries.

Part One offers a general survey of the patterns of Middle Eastern history from the rise of Islam to the eighteenth century. Chapters 1 and 2 present the main features of Islamic faith and ritual and examine the emergence of Islamic social and political institutions from the time of the Prophet Muhammad to the end of the fourteenth century. In trying to portray Islam on its own terms and in its proper historical setting, these chapters underline the importance of the interaction between the Islam of the Quranic revelations and the settled civilizations of the Near East. They also stress the global aspects of Islamic civilization and try to demonstrate that the dynamic of that civilization cannot be understood by focusing only on the rise and decline of one Middle Eastern Islamic empire, but rather must be seen as a global pattern of several different centers of Islamic florescence, each true to the essentials of the Quranic revelations yet also anchored in economically and culturally unique settings. Chapter 3 examines the rise of the Ottoman Empire and the formation of Ottoman ruling institutions and discusses the rise and fall of the Iran-based Safavid Empire.

Part Two focuses on three main centers of political authority—the Ottoman Empire, the autonomous province of Egypt, and the Qajar Empire of Iran—from the early nineteenth century to the peace settlements of 1919–1920. The patterns of transformation in Iran were different from those in Egypt and the Ottoman Empire. These chapters attempt to identify and explain the differences and to show their significance for the development of modern Iran. The modern history of the Ottoman-Egyptian Middle East is approached with the belief that the area was organized by a long-established system based on Ottoman-Islamic practices and values. The Ottoman system had never been either static or uniform throughout the region, and it was again in flux on the eve of its nineteenth- and twentieth-century transformation. Nevertheless, after three hundred years, the general objectives and practices of Ottoman rule were understood and their application was predictable to the inhabitants of the various regions of the empire.

One prominent theme of the book is that the disruption and eventual destruction of established Ottoman-Islamic ruling practices and social relationships during and after the reforming era was a wrenching and disorienting experience for the peoples of the Middle East. The terminology of this process of change has often been presented under the headings of “modernization” or “Westernization.” However, those terms have taken on connotations that are either value-laden, culturally judgmental, or both. This book instead employs the term transformation, which better conveys the objectives of nineteenth-century reformers and also places nineteenth-century changes in the context of earlier eras of Middle Eastern transformation. The nineteenth century was not the first instance of externally inspired transformation in the Islamic Middle East, nor was it the first attempt at Ottoman reform. The rise and consolidation of the Ottoman Empire in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries was itself a transforming process. So, too, was the imposition of Shi‘ism in Iran during the same period. Nineteenth-century Middle Eastern rulers did not intend to “Westernize” their states but merely sought to adopt selected European technological improvements and organizational methods for their armed forces. However, as Part Two demonstrates, as greater numbers of influential administrators and military officers became committed to selective borrowing from Europe, the transformation was accelerated and spread to spheres outside the purely military.

Next, Chapter 4 discusses the early phase of the transformation as embodied in the reform programs of the Ottoman sultans, Selim III and Mahmud II, and Muhammad Ali of Egypt. Chapter 5 examines the acceleration of the transformation during the Ottoman Tanzimat and the reign of Isma‘il in Egypt, showing how the combination of increased expenditures and the loss of local markets to European merchants led to the bankruptcy of the two states and the eventual British occupation of Egypt. It also focuses on educational changes and shows the patterns by which the so-called French knowers came to be favored over the graduates of religious institutions for positions in the bureaucracy, the teaching profession, and the judiciary. Chapter 6 explores the impact of the British occupation on Egypt up to the outbreak of World War I and examines Qajar Iran during the reign of Nasir al-Din Shah. Introducing late nineteenth-century Iran at this point in the book enables readers to grasp the differences between the Ottoman-Egyptian experiences already discussed and the circumstances affecting Iran.

Chapter 7 presents the perspective of individuals who opposed the transformation or at least wished it to be more firmly grounded in Islamic practices and principles. The Ottoman ruler Sultan Abdul Hamid II and three rural reformist movements, the Wahhabi, the Sanusi, and the Mahdiyyah, are representative of the trend of resistance to European-style reforms that surfaced in the late nineteenth century. The chapter also deals with the ideas of Islamic reform put forward by Muhammad Abduh as well as with the more secular “Arab awakening” sparked by the activities of Christian missionaries and the introduction of the printing press. The discussion in Chapter 8 concentrates on two very different protest movements in favor of constitutional government. The Young Turk revolution restored the Ottoman constitution and brought to power a group of military officers and civil servants educated in the new institutions and determined to reform, and thus to save, the Ottoman Empire. The first section of this chapter examines their policies and seeks to identify the main currents of communal identity that competed for the loyalties of the Ottoman population on the eve of World War I. The second section discusses the Iranian constitutional upheaval of 1905–1911 and compares it to the Young Turk era.

Chapter 9 deals with World War I in the Middle East, the various wartime agreements and treaties regarding the disposition of Ottoman territories, and the final peace settlement that divided the former Ottoman Arab lands between Britain and France. The conclusion of this chapter argues that the passing of the Ottoman Empire and of the organizing principles on which it was based was of seminal importance for the peoples of the Middle East, particularly the inhabitants of the former Arab provinces of the empire. The Arabs had not prepared for a post-Ottoman order, and certainly not for one that found them ruled by British and French occupiers. For the quarter century after 1920, the Arab leaders were preoccupied with gaining full independence from the European powers and establishing national identities for their new states.

Part Three covers the period from the imposition of the mandate system to the creation of Israel in 1948. The thorny question of how to present Middle Eastern history after the Ottoman collapse and the emergence of several new states has received a variety of answers in other books. The hope here is that a comparative state approach brings out the characteristics of special chronological eras or periods. In short, Part Three argues that there was an interwar era that possessed certain common features that distinguish it from preceding and succeeding periods. The emphasis, for example, on the importance of the Ottoman background to this period in Turkey and the Arab successor states suggests the existence of continuities in the political leadership that set the tone for the relationship between the local elite and the European occupying power. Chapter 10 compares the objectives and impact of the reform programs of Atatürk in Turkey and Reza Shah in Iran. The treatment of the Arab states tries not only to show the internal continuities and breaks with the late Ottoman era but also to demonstrate that the British and French patterns of administrative control played an important role in shaping the development of the states under their rule. Chapter 11 discusses Egypt, Iraq, and Transjordan, countries in which Britain exercised dominance, and Chapter 12 examines French rule in Syria and Lebanon as well as the special case of the rise of Saudi Arabia. The latter chapter concludes with an analysis of the major political ideologies of the interwar period: regionalism, pan-Arab nationalism, and the continuing appeal of Islamic solidarity. Chapter 13 deals with the Palestine mandate and the birth of Israel.

Part Four is a study of the Middle East from 1945 to the early 1970s. Chapter 14 discusses Turkey to the restoration of civilian government in 1983 and Iran to the eve of revolution in the mid-1970s. Chapters 15 and 16 treat the Arab states, and their relations with Israel, during the period defined as “the Nasser era,” a term employed in the belief that Nasserism exercised a major influence on the Arab world, not just by the inspiration it provided during the rule of the Egyptian president but also by the despair it left in the wake of its unexpected collapse in 1967. Chapter 17 examines Israeli political culture and institutions from 1948 to 1977; it also treats the emergence of the Palestine Liberation Organization and the impact of that organization’s search for a regional base of operations up to Black September 1970.

Part Five examines the Middle East in the 1970s and the 1980s, with a focus on the resurgence of Islam. These chapters were reorganized in the fifth edition, but the introduction retains the earlier editions' guidelines for understanding the new historical patterns that emerged in the early 1970s. Of course, no single organizing theme can accurately embrace the diversity of the emergent trends, but the resurgence of Islamic-based political activity is certainly one of the most far-reaching. Chapter 18 is divided into two parts: The first analyzes the Iranian revolution of 1979 and discusses the significance of the creation of the Islamic Republic of Iran; the second examines the resurgence of politicized Islam as a general Middle Eastern phenomenon. Chapter 19, which focuses on Egypt and Lebanon during the 1970s and 1980s, discusses the pressures that influenced President Anwar Sadat of Egypt to launch a war against Israel in 1973 and to sign a peace treaty with that same state in 1979. It also examines Egypt's Islamist opposition, many features of which characterized the Islamic resurgence as a whole. Turning to Lebanon, the chapter focuses on the local demographic changes that combined with the activities of Palestinian organizations to plunge Lebanon into a bloody sectarian war and to prompt Israel to invade the country in 1982. The chapter concludes with a section on the early years of Husni Mubarak's rule in Egypt (the increased attraction of Islam as a mainstream opposition movement is a theme returned to in the analysis in Chapter 26 of Mubarak's fall). The focus in Chapter 20 is on Saudi Arabia and Yemen from the early 1950s to the 1980s and on the oil-producing Arab states of the Persian Gulf from their formation to the 1980s. It stresses the effects of the oil price revolution of 1973 and discusses the tensions caused by the ruling families' deployment of vast wealth to create social and technological change as well as to prevent political change, and considers the role played by Islam as a legitimating factor. Presidents Hafiz al-Asad of Syria and Saddam Husayn of Iraq both dominated their respective countries for about three decades. Chapter 21 examines their rise to power, their domestic and foreign policies, the transformation in the social composition of the ruling elite that their rule represented and encouraged, and their brutal repression of the Islamist opposition. The chapter closes with a discussion of the Iran-Iraq War of 1980–1988, the aftermath of which set the stage for Husayn's invasion of Kuwait in 1990.

Part Six covers developments in the region from the early 1990s onward. From 1987 to 1991 the Middle East was rocked by a series of internal crises and an external intervention that had momentous consequences for the future of the region. Chapter 22 examines the Palestinian uprising known as the intifada and the origins and outcome of the Gulf War of 1991. The chapter concludes with a discussion of the impact of the prolonged aftermath of the war on Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Yemen, and Iraq up to the turn of the twenty-first century. Chapter 23 is devoted to an analysis of the rise and fall of the Oslo peace process, concluding with a discussion of the second intifada and its ramifications. Chapter 24 provides both a comparative discussion of Turkey and Iran since the 1990s, and a section on political developments in Lebanon. Chapter 25 examines the era of American dominance since 1990: It opens with an analysis of US Middle Eastern policy following the 1991 Gulf War and then treats the intensification of military unilateralism post–September 11, with a particular focus on the disastrous 2003 invasion of Iraq—from the ruins of which emerged the Islamic State of Iraq and al-Sham (ISIS)—and the perceived challenges posed by Iran’s nuclear program. Chapter 26 considers the significance of the 2011 Arab uprisings and their immediate aftermath, including the evident success of counter-revolutionary forces in Egypt and the Gulf and the collapse of Syria, Libya, and Yemen into brutal civil wars. The chapter, and book, concludes by drawing some connecting threads with the historical legacy spawned a century ago by the dismemberment of the Ottoman Empire.

The focus of this book is primarily political, but discussions of major social, economic, and ideological currents have been weaved into the narrative in the hope that a full and integrated history of the Middle East emerges. Of course, a single book cannot cover everything (and should not try to do so). In recognition of this fact, the book provides an annotated and updated bibliography that offers guidance to readers seeking more in-depth information on the topics dealt with in this book as well as on other aspects of the Middle Eastern past that are not treated here.

THE SIXTH EDITION is accompanied by a test bank and PowerPoint slides for instructors using the book. The test bank includes approximately thirty test questions for each chapter in a mix of different types (short answer, essay, and multiple choice). The PowerPoint slides include basic lecture outlines that can be easily expanded to fit individual courses, as well as the maps and photos from the book. ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

As the distillation of more than thirty years of passionate teaching and meticulous scholarship, the first three editions of this textbook greatly expanded William Cleveland's reputation for engaging and respecting undergraduate students and for making modern Middle Eastern history more comprehensible without reducing complexities to simplicities. His acknowledgment of the support he received is still very pertinent.

From William L. Cleveland's Preface to the Third Edition

It is a pleasure to acknowledge the assistance I have received from others. My greatest debt is to the many scholars of the Middle East whose works have guided and informed me throughout the preparation of this book. In the course of attempting to broaden my own knowledge of the field, I have gained a greater awareness of their contributions and a new respect for their achievements. I hope I have appropriately recognized my debt in the notes and the bibliography. Family members, colleagues, and friends outside the academy offered encouragement when it was most needed, and I am grateful to them all—especially my wife, Gretchen.

Throughout the preparation of the book, from the first proposal sent to the publisher to this third edition, I have benefited from the assistance of what I have come to regard as my Mamluk cohort group. Professors Donald Malcolm Reid, F. Robert Hunter, and James P. Jankowski have provided detailed critical commentaries, suggestions for revision, and consistent encouragement over a period of time that now exceeds a decade. It is with the deepest gratitude that I acknowledge the time and effort they have devoted to improving this work. I have also benefited from the judicious advice of L. Carl Brown, the astute observations of Jane Power, and the efforts of research assistant Lauren Faulkner. In addition, I would like to acknowledge the skills of Eric Leinberger, the cartographer for all three editions.

The questions raised and the suggestions made by my undergraduate students over the years have influenced the organization and presentation of the book. I hope the end result answers most of their questions and incorporates the best of their suggestions. If it succeeds in making modern Middle Eastern history more comprehensible without reducing complexities to simplicities, it will have served its purpose.

Throughout the preparation of the updated editions, I too have benefited greatly from the support and help of a number of friends and colleagues. I owe a particular debt to Greg Blue for his close and critical reading of early drafts of Part Six of this edition; and I would also like to give special thanks to James P. Jankowski, Donald Reid, Chris Ross, and Michael Thornhill whose suggestions greatly strengthened earlier editions. I would also like to acknowledge the excellent suggestions provided by reviewers of the fifth edition, including the following: Kenneth Friesen (Fresno Pacific University); Stacy Holden (Purdue University); Susan Maneck (Jackson State University); Ibrahim al-Marashi (California State University, San Marcos); Shane Minkin (University of Massachusetts, Lowell); Sreemati Mitter (Brown University); Negin Nabavi (Montclair State University); Daniel Snell (University of Oklahoma); Beverly Tsacoyianis (University of Memphis); Ellen Wald (Jacksonville University); and others who wish to remain anonymous.

It is a pleasure to take the opportunity here to acknowledge my debt to the remarkable teachers, colleagues, and students whom I have come to know over the past three decades and whose works, methods, and reviews have helped guide me throughout the preparation of these updated editions: Kamran Bashir, Gavin Brockett, Terry Burke, Ralph Croizier, Rod Dobell, Khaled Fahmy, Nova Garside, Michael Gilsenan, Robert Jackson, Ezra Karmel, Hanna Kassis, Roger Owen, Mouin Rabbani, Andrew Rippin, Eugene Rogan, Gus Thaiss, Elizabeth Thompson, Andrew Wender, John M. Willis, Christine Winter, Ted Wooley, Karl Yambert, and, of course, Bill Cleveland. None of these friends, teachers, and colleagues is of course in any way responsible for the views expressed or the oversights committed.

I also wish to thank all those at Westview who have contributed to the development of this edition, especially the support and patience of Ada Fung. In addition, I would like to acknowledge the skills of Ole Heggen and the Avalon cartography group who have drawn the maps for the last four chapters, and the project management of Lori Hobkirk and thorough copyediting skills of Josephine Mariea. I am, as always, grateful to Gretchen Cleveland for her constant encouragement.

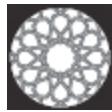

Members of my wider family have been an unfailing source of support, and I thank them all, especially my mother. This edition simply would not have been possible without the curiosity, laughter, and wonder of Eila, Peter, and Seth. My wife, Saija, deserves my deepest thanks for her generous love throughout this project.

A NOTE ABOUT PLACE NAMES AND TRANSLITERATION

For purposes of clarity and consistency, I have used the names of modern countries to refer to certain regions during the entire period covered in this book, even if those names were not in use in the past. Specifically, I refer to the area of Iraq or the lands of Iraq to designate the settled areas of the Tigris-Euphrates River basin; to Greater Syria to indicate the region currently divided among Israel, Jordan, Lebanon, and Syria; and to Iran to designate the territory between Iraq and Turkmenistan. I also employ the name Iran instead of Persia. In discussions pertaining to the modern states of Syria, Iraq, and Iran after they came into existence, I use their names to refer specifically to the territory embraced within the frontiers of those states.

The transliteration apparatus has been kept to a minimum. Hamzas are not indicated, and the Arabic ayn is indicated by ‘, but only when it occurs in the middle of a word. In most cases, the plurals of words have been formed by adding an s. An exception is the plural of alim, which is rendered as ulama.

PART ONE

THE DEVELOPMENT OF ISLAMIC CIVILIZATION TO THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

Islam is often viewed solely in terms of its origins in the barren, sparsely settled Arabian Peninsula. To be sure, Islam was revealed to the Prophet Muhammad in the years 610 CE to 632 CE in the Arabian city of Mecca. However, during the century following Muhammad's death, the Arabs expanded out of the peninsula and conquered an empire stretching from Spain to present-day Pakistan. The great capital cities of the first Arab-Islamic empires, Damascus and Baghdad, were located not in Arabia but in the long-settled lands of antiquity. To understand the development of Islam and Islamic civilization, we must recognize that the Middle East region into which Islam expanded was a rich repository of centuries of accumulated intellectual exchanges, religious experiences, and administrative practices. Islamic society built upon these existing foundations and was shaped by them. As Ira Lapidus noted, "The civilization of Islam, though born in Mecca, also had its progenitors in Palestine, Babylon, and Persepolis."¹

Ancient Near Eastern civilization developed within the city-states that first appeared in lower Iraq around 3500 BCE. These settled communities created written alphabets, governing institutions, and elaborate religious rituals. By about 2400 BCE, larger political entities emerged as regional empires in which several cities were incorporated into a single state ruled by a dominant monarch. The growth of ever-larger regional empires acted as an integrative force, unifying greater numbers of people under common legal systems and exposing them to shared cultural and religious experiences. Over the course of centuries, improvements in agricultural and military technology, transportation and communications, in social and administrative organization enabled empires to dominate increasingly extensive territories. This process first culminated in Egypt's Nile Valley, where an advanced civilization took shape under the rule of the pharaohs. The monuments to gods and kings that line the Nile testify to the shared religious and dynastic traditions of the ancient Egyptians. The Iranian-based Acheminid Empire (550 BCE–331 BCE) had a similar unifying effect, as it brought all the Middle Eastern lands from Egypt to the Oxus River into a single imperial framework.

In the wake of Alexander the Great's conquests in the fourth century BCE, the Middle Eastern lands between Iran and the Mediterranean Sea absorbed yet another layer of tradition as Greek became the language of administration and high culture. Alexandria and Antioch developed into centers of Greek learning, and Greek became the dominant language of discourse among the urban elite from Egypt to Anatolia.

The absorption of new ideas and techniques continued with the Roman conquest and the consolidation of Rome's efficient administrative practices in Egypt, Palestine, Syria, and Anatolia during the first century BCE. Yet although the Mediterranean lands of the Middle East were administered as provinces of the Roman Empire, their high culture remained more Hellenic than Latin. With the transfer of the imperial Roman capital to Constantinople in 330 CE and the fall of western Rome a century later, the eastern identity of the empire was solidified. That identity was represented by the Byzantine Empire, which preserved the administrative practices of Rome within the context of Hellenic civilization.

Formative Islam not only interacted with the existing material cultures outlined above but also established religious beliefs and practices. At the time of the rise of Islam, the official religions of the dominant Byzantine and Sasanian empires had largely subsumed local and regional cults, though they were still in existence. Subject peoples were expected to abandon their local gods and goddesses and adhere to the officially sanctioned imperial religion. Imperial consolidation led to religious consolidation and the emergence of monotheism, the belief in the supremacy of one god. By the time of the Arab-Islamic conquests, most Middle East inhabitants belonged to one of three monotheistic faiths.

Monotheism was first preached by the prophets of ancient Israel and is one of the most significant and enduring legacies of the Jewish faith. Although the Romans dispersed the Jews from Palestine in the first and second centuries CE, Jewish communities continued to flourish in the Middle East on the eve of Islam's rise. Another form of monotheism was Zoroastrianism. In the seventh century BCE, the Iranian prophet Zoroaster preached a doctrine that upheld the existence of a supreme God pitted in a constant struggle against the forces of evil. The rulers of the Iranian-based Sasanian Empire (224 CE–634 CE) revived Zoroastrianism and adopted it as their state's official religion.

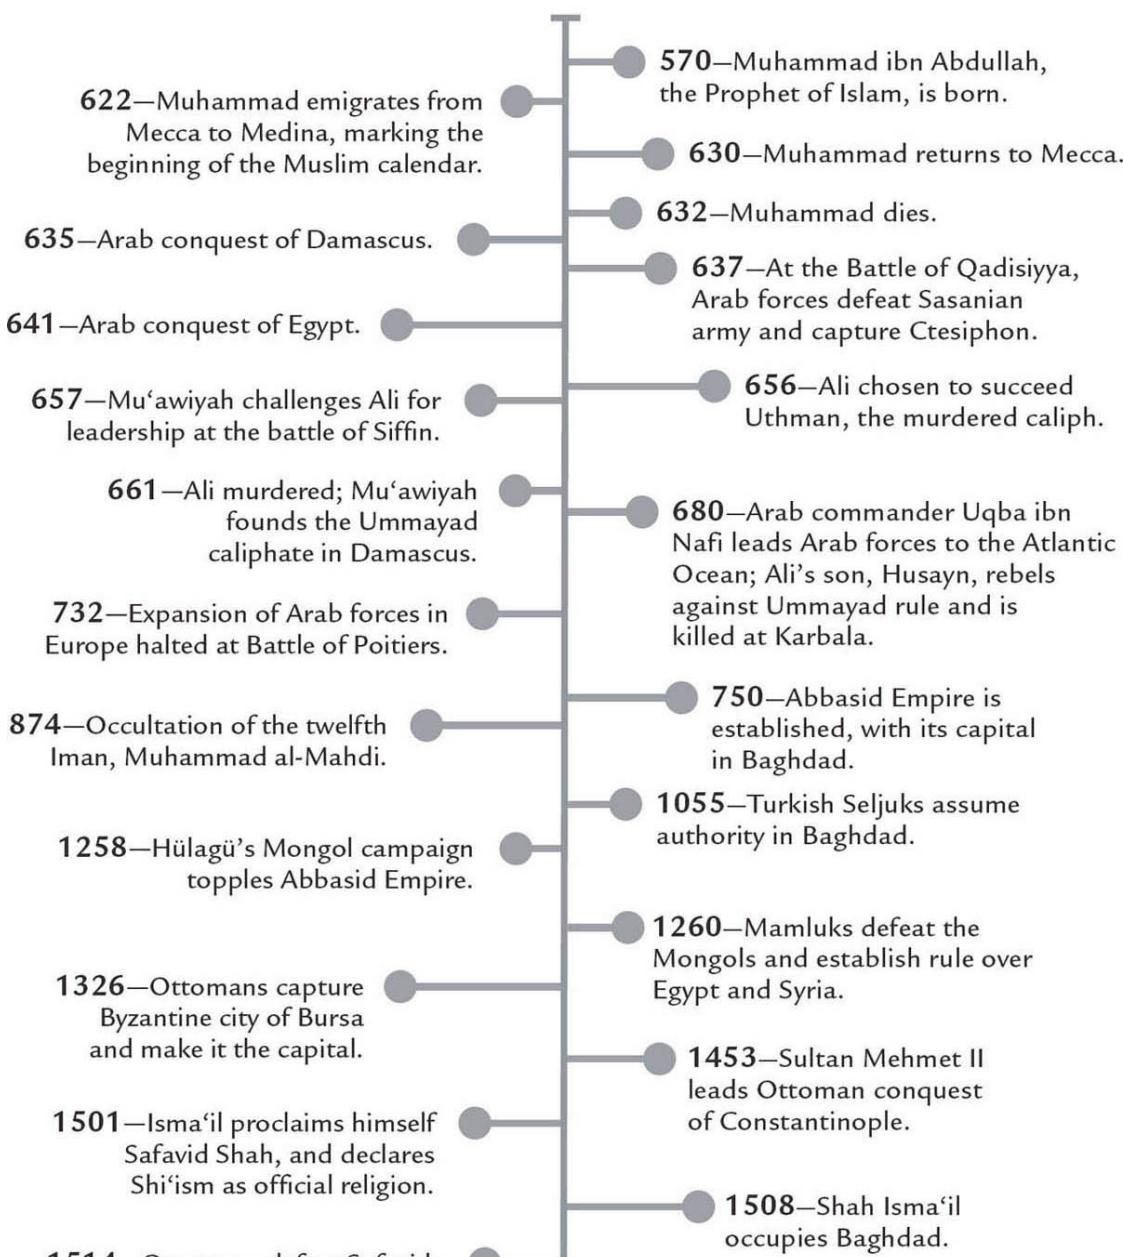

A third monotheistic faith, Christianity, grew rapidly from Roman times onward and was proclaimed the state religion of the Byzantine Empire in the late fourth century. However, differing interpretations over the nature of Christ divided the adherents of the faith and led to the growth of separate churches, each jealously guarding its version of the truth. At the Council of Chalcedon in 451, the main body of the church defined Christ as having two natures, divine and human. But other Christian communities, known as Monophysites, believed that Christ had only a single nature, which was divine. The Monophysite doctrine was institutionalized in the Coptic church of Egypt, which had its own religious hierarchy and conducted its ritual in the native Egyptian Coptic language. The Armenian church in Anatolia also held to the Monophysite interpretation, as did certain groups in Syria. At the time of Islam's rise, these regional Monophysite churches, with their vernacular liturgies, were under attack from the Byzantine authorities, who sought to impose on the empire's subjects the official Greek Orthodox version of Christianity.

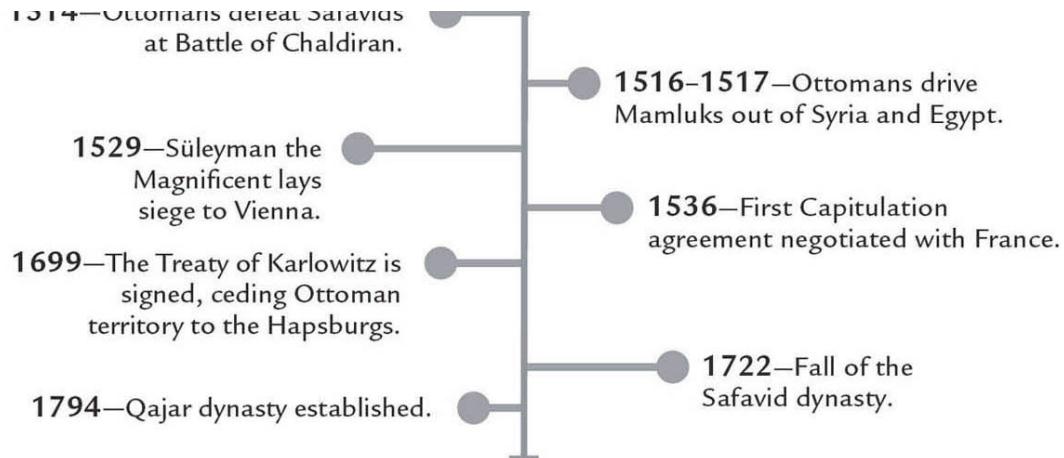

Islam unified Byzantium's Greco-Christian territories and Iranian-Zoroastrianism's lands into a single religiously based universal empire. The encounter between the new faith of Islam and the Middle East's established traditions led to the creation of a new civilization that was profoundly and unmistakably Islamic yet also bore evidence of the centuries of accumulated practices that had preceded it.

KEY EVENTS: THE DEVELOPMENT OF ISLAMIC CIVILIZATION TO THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

CHAPTER 1

THE RISE AND EXPANSION OF ISLAM

On the eve of the rise of Islam, two competing imperial states, the Roman-Byzantine Empire in the west and the Sasanian Empire of Iran in the east, ruled the settled lands of the Middle East. The Byzantine emperors were successors to the Caesars and presided over an imposing edifice of high cultural and political traditions that blended Greek learning, Roman administration, and Greek Orthodox Christianity. In the early seventh century, the emperor's territorial possessions stretched from the Italian peninsula across southern Europe to the magnificent capital city of Constantinople. The empire's Middle Eastern provinces included Egypt, Palestine, and Syria as well as parts of Iraq and Anatolia. Supported by a standing professional army, a highly developed bureaucracy, and the priesthood of the Orthodox church, the Byzantium rulers appeared to be powerful and secure.

In the late sixth and early seventh centuries, however, Byzantium was weakened by challenges to its military, religious, and administrative authority. Beginning in 540, the imperial rivalry between the Byzantines and Sasanians erupted into open warfare that continued almost uninterrupted until 629. Campaign and counter-campaign exhausted the military forces of both empires, depleted their treasuries, and inflicted extensive damage to the lands and cities lying between the Nile and the Euphrates. To meet the financial demands of constant warfare, the Byzantine emperors periodically raised taxes, a measure that alienated their subjects, who had already suffered economic hardships from warring armies passing back and forth across their lands.

Religious divisions created additional tensions between the Byzantine state and its subjects. Once the Byzantine Empire adopted Greek Orthodox Christianity as the state religion in the late fourth century, the emperors and the church attempted to enforce popular acceptance of this officially approved version of the faith. But peoples within the empire continued to adhere to other forms of Christianity and to Judaism as well as to use their own vernacular languages for scripture and ritual. Unwilling to tolerate these challenges to official orthodoxy, the state branded them as heretical and undertook to suppress them. The persecution of Jews and of Christians outside the Greek Orthodox community caused great disaffection within the empire and explains in part why many Byzantine subjects welcomed the arrival of the more religiously tolerant Muslim rulers.

The Sasanian Empire of Iran, with its capital at Ctesiphon on the Tigris River, contested Byzantium for control of the territories between Iraq and Egypt. Heir to the 1,200-year-old Acheminid tradition of universal Iranian empire, the Sasanian state was based on the principle of absolute monarchy. The emperor was the king of kings (shahanshah), a distant and all-powerful ruler living in palatial splendor and surrounded by elaborate ceremonial trappings. Over the centuries, Iranian bureaucratic practices had become refined, and a large and experienced scribal class administered the Sasanian Empire. Like their Byzantine counterparts, the Sasanian emperors had at their disposal an effective standing professional army, which was noted for its heavily armed and armored cavalry.

Yet popular discontent, much of which stemmed from religious diversity, diluted the Sasanian Empire's apparent strength. By the late sixth century, the official Sasanian state religion of Zoroastrianism had become more significant as a ceremonial faith for the ruling elite than as the religion of the population. In the western part of the empire in particular, people were more attracted to various strains of Christianity and Judaism than to Zoroastrianism. In the absence of a unifying religious affiliation with their ruler, many subjects of the Sasanian Empire lacked feelings of loyalty toward the state.

Although the Byzantine and Sasanian empires were in transition when Islam first extended into them, it is important to recognize their impact on the development of Islamic governing practices and religious doctrine. Formative Islam would be influenced by the Greek legacy of Byzantium, by the bureaucratic tradition of Iran, and by the concepts of emperor that had developed in the Constantinople and Ctesiphon courts. Islam must be understood as a product of the societies into which it spread as well as of the society from which it originated.

PRE-ISLAMIC ARABIA

With the exception of Yemen in the south and a few scattered oasis settlements elsewhere, the Arabian Peninsula is a vast desert. It is the home of the Arabs, an ancient Semitic people whose origins cannot be traced with certainty. In contrast to the rigorously administered domains of the Byzantine and Sasanian empires, the Arabian Peninsula of the early seventh century lacked any central organizing authority. It had no state structure, no common legal system, and no administrative center. Tribes were the largest units of social and political organization to which an individual's loyalties were given. Each tribe was an entity unto itself, bound by ties of kinship based on a belief in common descent from a founding ancestor. The majority of Arabia's inhabitants were pastoral nomads raising camels, sheep, or goats. The dearth of pasturelands required constant movement from one grazing ground to another. Competition for the scarce resources of the land created rivalries among the tribes, and warfare became ingrained as a way of life. All males were expected to be warriors, and accounts of the exploits of the most daring among them became enshrined in tribal culture. The widespread experience of the Arabs in warfare would be a significant factor in the early expansion of Islam.

Notwithstanding the divisions inherent in the tribal structure of pre-Islamic Arabia, forces of cultural unity were present. The Bedouin ethos of bravery and honor was celebrated in a special style of Arabic poetry known as a qasidah. The existence of this poetry, which was recited at market fairs and tribal gatherings, has convinced historians that the Arabs of the seventh century possessed a common poetic language that could be understood across different regions of the peninsula. This was of the utmost significance for the spread of Islam because it meant that the Prophet Muhammad's religious message could be communicated to Arabic speakers across a broad expanse of territory.

Isolated though it was, the Arabian Peninsula was not completely cut off from the forces that shaped Middle Eastern civilization. On the eve of Islam's rise, two Arab tribal confederations guarded the northern Arabian frontiers as client states of Byzantium and the Sasanians, respectively. Both of these Arab confederations were Christian, providing evidence of the spread of the concept of monotheism among the Arabs before Muhammad's time.

At the southwestern tip of Arabia, Yemen provided another entry point for external influences into the peninsula. Unlike the rest of Arabia, Yemen was a fertile and well-watered region able to support a settled agricultural society. By the fourth and fifth centuries CE, several Arab communities in southern Arabia had adopted Christianity, and the ruler of Yemen's last pre-Islamic dynasty converted to Judaism. Yet despite the fermentation of religious doctrines in the settled regions of northern and southern Arabia, most of the tribes of the interior continued to practice various forms of animism, worshipping local idols or deities.

During the two centuries before Islam, Arabia acquired increasing importance as a commercial transit route between the Middle Eastern empires and Yemen. The wars between Byzantium and the Sasanians disrupted the east–west overland routes and gave rise to a brisk north–south caravan trade through the Hijaz, Arabia's coastal plain adjacent to the Red Sea. The main Arabian beneficiary of this commercial network was the city of Mecca, which developed into the most important commercial center of the peninsula. By the early seventh century, Meccan merchants had accumulated sufficient capital to organize their own caravans and to provide payments to an extensive network of tribes in exchange for pledges to allow the caravans to pass in peace.

In addition to its role as a commercial center, Mecca was a religious site of major significance. The city's shrine, the Ka'ba, became the center of an animistic cult that attracted worshipers throughout western Arabia. By the time of Muhammad's birth, the Ka'ba had become the site of an annual pilgrimage during which warfare was suspended, and Mecca's sanctuary became a kind of neutral ground where tribal disputes could be resolved. The city derived considerable income from its religious role, and its leading families recognized the importance of the sanctuary as a source of wealth and influence.

Mecca's leading clans were all members of the Quraysh tribe that settled the city, established its religious role, and dominated its political and commercial life. Although formal municipal organizations did not exist, a council of prominent Quraysh merchants loosely regulated the city's affairs. Historians have suggested that prior to the birth of Islam, Mecca was in a state of transition between the vanishing tribal ways and a nascent urbanism spawned by merchant capitalism. Customary tribal values were being displaced, but no fully developed set of communal values suitable for an urban setting had yet emerged.

MUHAMMAD AND THE FOUNDATIONS OF ISLAM

Muhammad ibn Abdullah, the future Prophet of Islam, was born in Mecca around 570. His early life gave little indication of the compelling prophet and skillful statesman he would later become. He was born into the Hashim clan, a subtribe of the Quraysh. Orphaned at two, Muhammad was raised and sheltered by his uncle, Abu Talib. As a young man, he engaged in the caravan trade and may have journeyed to Damascus. His financial position was secured when, in his early twenties, he married a wealthy widow, Khadijah. Khadijah holds an honored place in the history of Islam; she was the first convert to the new faith after Muhammad himself, and she supported him during the difficult early years of his prophethood, when most of Mecca's population scorned him.

Muhammad was widely respected as a decent and trustworthy individual. He lived an otherwise ordinary life as merchant, husband, and father to the four daughters born to Khadijah. But as Muhammad neared his fortieth year, his behavior gradually began to change. He often left Mecca, sometimes for days at a time, to meditate in solitude in the mountains outside the city. Some scholars have conjectured that Muhammad was reflecting on what he saw as the problems that afflicted Meccan society and was seeking ways to resolve them. It was during one of his solitary vigils on Mount Hira that Muhammad was summoned to his prophetic mission, an event known in Islam as the Night of Power. The summons came as a command from God, transmitted through the angel Gabriel, for Muhammad to recite to his fellow Meccans the divine messages he had been chosen to receive. The Night of Power marked the beginning of a movement that would transform Arab life and lead to the emergence of a universal monotheistic religion.

For the remaining twenty-two years of his life, Muhammad continued to receive revelations, which his companions recorded, memorized, and later collected into a single book, the Quran (Recitation), which constitutes the core of the Islamic faith. The Quran is a sacred work in both form and content. It contains God's commands and represents the direct word of God; its language is, therefore, divine and unchangeable. Throughout the centuries since the Night of Power, non-Muslims, especially the Christian and Jewish monotheists for whom Islam represented the most direct challenge, have had difficulty accepting the idea that the Quran contains God's words, not Muhammad's. The point here is not to debate the contesting claims to religious truth but to insist on the depth of Muhammad's experience and the utterly convincing language in which that experience was conveyed. The verses of the Quran, especially those from the Meccan period, reveal an individual possessed of a compelling sense of urgency and inspired by a commitment that transcended his previous existence and pushed him into the role for which he believed he had been chosen—the Prophet of God.

Muhammad's prophethood can be divided into two phases, the period at Mecca (610–622) and the years in Medina (622–632). The difference in the Prophet's circumstances during these two periods of his life is reflected in the style and content of the revelations. The Quran was revealed in a series of chapters (suras) and is organized according to the length of the chapters, with the longest first and the shortest at the end. The shorter chapters are from the Meccan years, when Muhammad concentrated on establishing the theological foundations of the faith. The central element of the Meccan period was an uncompromising monotheism. As an early Meccan revelation insisted,

Say: He is God, One, God, the Everlasting Refuge, who has not begotten, and has not been begotten, and equal to Him is not anyone.

(Sura 112)¹

The Arabic word for one supreme God, Allah, refers to the monotheistic deities of Judaism and Christianity as well as Islam. It is thus incorrect to employ the term Allah in an exclusively Islamic context. The term translates as God, and that is how it should be employed and understood.

What did the omnipotent deity of the Quran want from his human creations? In the Meccan revelations, he demanded that they practice prescribed patterns of worship and behavior. They were to submit to his will and show their gratitude toward him as the provider of the bounties of the earth. Islam means submission, and the followers of the faith, Muslims, are those who have submitted to the will of God. In addition to matters of ritual, God set forth commandments on how human beings should relate to one another in their daily social intercourse. He warned the people of Mecca to pay more attention to the less fortunate in society and to moderate their search for wealth. The following bluntly critical passage demonstrates God's displeasure at practices in the Mecca of Muhammad's day:

No indeed; but you honor not the orphan, and you urge not the feeding of the needy, and you devour the inheritance greedily, and you love wealth with an ardent love.

(Sura 89)

The Quran chastised those who were uncharitable and warned those who felt that their wealth had made them immune from punishment, that God would be the final judge of their afterlife. The concept of the Day of Judgment was a central element of the faith. The revelations warned the people of Mecca that the Almighty would assess their deeds, their attitudes, and even their innermost thoughts on Judgment Day. The theology of the Quran was thus basic and straightforward. Humans were instructed to obey the revealed will of an omnipotent God of judgment: Those who accepted him and followed all of his commands would be rewarded with paradise; those who rejected God and deviated from his commands would be condemned to the fires of Gehenna.

Muhammad's preaching attracted few converts and aroused considerable opposition during the Meccan period of his mission. After all, he posed a challenge to the social, economic, and religious structure of the city. He not only criticized the wealthy Quraysh merchants' attitudes but also condemned the religious practices that made Mecca a prosperous pilgrimage center. As the years passed and the Meccan opposition turned from scorn to threats of physical harm, Muhammad and his followers began to search for a more hospitable location. When an invitation came to them to settle in Yathrib (later Medina), Muhammad accepted it.

Located some 200 miles (322 kilometers) north of Mecca, Medina was a fertile oasis city suffering from the ravages of an extended blood feud among its several tribes. Muhammad was invited as a mediator, and Medinan representatives had promised him that any Muslims who accompanied him would receive protection. In 622 the small community of Muslims gradually migrated from Mecca to Medina. Known as the hijrah (emigration), this marked a turning point in the development of Islam: 622 is the first year of the Muslim calendar.

During his ten years in Medina, Muhammad's status rose dramatically. From a scorned prophet with few followers, he became the head of a small state and the dominant figure throughout Arabia. This transformation was achieved through a combination of warfare, negotiation, and preaching, the success of which seemed to confirm Muhammad's right not only to prophethood but to political leadership as well. Muhammad consolidated his authority in Medina by convincing influential personalities in the city to embrace Islam and accept his leadership. Once he established his power base, he was able to take measures against the groups that continued to deny his prophetic and political authority. Among the latter were several Jewish tribes whose members would not accept the legitimacy of Muhammad's claim as the Prophet. Muhammad eventually expelled them from Medina and ordered their property confiscated and distributed among the Muslim emigrants.

Even as he was consolidating his position in Medina, Muhammad made plans to bring Mecca into the expanding Islamic community. His strategy was to disrupt the caravan trade on which Mecca's prosperity depended. Within a year of his arrival in Medina, he ordered the first of what would become an ongoing series of raids on Meccan caravans. The initial raid occurred during one of the sacred pilgrimage months when, according to established custom, hostilities were to be suspended. This was disturbing to many Medina Muslims, who continued to respect existing traditions. However, a divine revelation sanctified warfare against unbelievers and designated all Muslims who engaged in spreading Islam through force of arms as deserving of special merit.

In retaliation for Muhammad's attacks on their caravans, the Meccans launched several campaigns against the Muslims in Medina, but each time, the outnumbered Muslim forces managed to hold their own and even to gain limited victories. Muhammad emerged during these encounters as an innovative military tactician, and his success in thwarting the Meccans enhanced his prestige among the neighboring tribes. Many swore their allegiance to him not because they fully understood or accepted the religious message of Islam but because association with Muhammad's endeavor appeared to guarantee victory, and with it came the spoils of war. The growth of the Prophet's forces and his effective alliances with the tribes enabled him to stifle the trade of Mecca, seriously threatening the city's prosperity.

In 630 Muhammad led a force of 10,000 men to the outskirts of Mecca. Demonstrating his qualities as a statesman, he promised the inhabitants that their lives would be spared and their property would remain secure if they surrendered the city and accepted Islam. The Quraysh leadership agreed to the terms, and the Prophet made a victorious entry into the city from which he had fled just eight years earlier. According to accounts of the occasion, Muhammad had the idols in the Ka'ba destroyed, proclaiming the shrine sacred to God. Mecca would remain a pilgrimage center, and the Ka'ba would become the focal point of the new faith.

In the years between the hijrah and the surrender of Mecca, Muhammad's leadership role became more complex. Medina developed into a small city-state with a treasury, a military, and an ever-increasing number of converts. The Quran reflected the changing circumstances by offering instructions on how the expanded functions of the state were to be organized and how people should conduct their relations with one another. The all-embracing nature of Islam was established in these commandments. For example, contracting a debt agreement in writing before a witness—as the Quran required—was a religious duty, and failure to follow this prescription was a sin. In this way, the details of marriage, inheritance, divorce, diet, and economic practice were made part of the religious experience of Muslims. Muhammad created a community (ummah) in which the laws of human behavior in daily life were prescribed by God.

It would be an exaggeration to call Arabia a cohesive, unified state after the surrender of Mecca; nevertheless, the transformation the Prophet created had been substantial. He had implanted the core concept of a community of believers united in their recognition of a single Supreme Deity and in their acceptance of that deity's authority in their daily lives; he had conveyed notions of social morality that forbade alcohol and the blood feud and that recognized the legal status of women and demanded protection for the less fortunate in society. Muhammad combined in his person the roles of prophet, state builder, and social reformer. Today there is much emphasis on the martial elements of Islam, but to comprehend fully Muhammad's mission, we need to consider the importance of Quranic passages like this one:

Be kind to parents, and the near kinsman, and to orphans, and to the needy, and to the neighbour who is of kin, and to the neighbour who is a stranger, and to the companion at your side, and to the traveller.

(Sura 4)

THE ARAB CONQUESTS AND THE FIRST EMPIRE

It would not have contradicted historical patterns if Arabia had rejected the Prophet's summons and taken up the old ways again upon his death in 632. Instead, Muslim factions in Mecca and Medina resolved to continue the development of the new religious community and competed with one another to assert their control over it. Because Muhammad had no sons and because the Quran contained no clear instructions on how a successor should be chosen, the question of the leadership of the community was open to different interpretations. The early converts to Islam who had suffered with Muhammad in Mecca and participated in the hijrah to Medina preempted all other claimants by naming one of their own, Abu Bakr, as the new head of the community. The other factions accepted Abu Bakr's leadership, but the dispute over the first succession sowed seeds of conflict that have affected Islam throughout its history.

Abu Bakr (632–634) was simply called the successor—khalif—anglicized as caliph. Eventually the term caliph came to designate the religious and political leader of the Islamic community, and the office became known as the caliphate. Abu Bakr and his three successors, Umar (634–644), Uthman (644–656), and Ali (656–661), are known in Islamic history as the Rashidun (rightly guided) caliphs in recognition of their personal closeness to the Prophet and their presumed adherence to Quranic regulations. Although two of them were assassinated and their reigns were filled with political and social turmoil, Muslims of later and even more troubled times looked back with nostalgia on the era when the four companions of the Prophet launched the movement that thrust the Arabs out of the peninsula and into world history.

The second caliph, Umar, recognized the need to direct the tribes' raiding instincts away from intercommunal conflict and authorized attacks against the southern flanks of Byzantium and Sasanian Iran. Thus began the epoch of the Arab conquests and the building of an Islamic empire.

The speed and extent of the Arab conquests were remarkable. In 637 the Arab forces defeated the imperial Sasanian army at the battle of Qadisiyya, which was quickly followed by the capture of Ctesiphon and the beginning of the difficult Arab campaign across the Iranian plateau toward the Indian subcontinent. Success against Byzantium was equally swift. The Arabs captured Damascus in 635, and in 641 they occupied parts of the rich agricultural province of Egypt. By 670 the western campaign against Byzantine and Berber resistance had reached present-day Tunisia, and in 680 the daring Arab commander Uqba ibn Nafi led a small force from Tunisia through Algeria and Morocco to the Atlantic Ocean. The westward expansion of the Arabs culminated in the conquest of Spain in the first half of the eighth century. Within 100 years of the Prophet's death, Arab forces had reached the Indian subcontinent in the east, and in the west, they had occupied Spain and crossed the Pyrenees into France before the forces of Charles Martel finally halted them at the battle of Poitiers in 732. In this first wave of conquests, the Sasanian Empire was completely destroyed and its territory absorbed within an Arab-Muslim administration. Byzantium, although it suffered the loss of its core Middle Eastern and North African provinces, retained control of Anatolia and the Balkans and presented a formidable barrier to Muslim expansion until the Ottomans overcame it in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries.

Even more stunning than the speed and extent of the conquests was their durability: With the exception of Spain, which retained an Arab-Islamic presence until the fifteenth century, the areas occupied during the first century of expansion have remained Islamic, if not Arabic, to the present day. In North Africa, as in Egypt and the eastern Mediterranean—the heartlands of Hellenism and early Christianity—and in the long-settled region of Iraq, the Arabic language and the Islamic faith became dominant. Persian language and culture eventually reasserted themselves in Iran, but they were expressed in an Islamic idiom.

The conquests would not have been so swift or so durable without the existence of a combination of social, economic, and religious factors that facilitated the local population's acceptance of the new Arab rulers. First, as we discussed earlier, monotheistic religions were widely practiced among the peoples in the conquered territories, and the Islamic assertion of monotheism placed it within the existing religious traditions. Second, Islam manifested considerable tolerance toward non-Muslims. The Quran commanded Muslims to protect “people of the Book”—that is, Jews and Christians who possessed a revealed scripture.

In practice, this tolerance was extended to the Zoroastrians of Iran and the Hindus of the Indian subcontinent. Forced conversions played only a small part in the Arab conquests, and for at least two centuries the majority of the inhabitants of the Islamic empire were non-Muslims. They were known as dhimmis, a term meaning followers of the religions tolerated by law. Dhimmis were allowed the freedom to practice their religion and to manage their internal affairs through their own religious officials. However, dhimmis were not regarded as equal to Muslims: They were required to pay a special poll tax (jizyah), they were prohibited from serving in the military and from wearing certain colors, and their residences and places of worship could not be as large as those of Muslims. Although these and other restrictions constituted a form of discrimination, they represented an unusually tolerant attitude for the era and stood in marked contrast to the practices of the Byzantine Empire.

The taxes imposed by the Arab-Islamic state were less burdensome than those levied by the Byzantine and Sasanian empires. Moreover, the Arab rulers tended to leave existing administrative practices and local customs undisturbed. Although some of the conquered peoples adopted Islam, the Arabs did not encourage conversions during the first century of their rule; this was partly because the jizyah constituted an important source of state revenue and partly because the Arabs, at this early stage in the development of Islam, regarded it as an exclusively Arab religion.

THE FIRST CIVIL WAR AND THE END OF THE RASHIDUN CALIPHATE

The question of the succession to the caliphate had been largely ignored in the rush of the early conquests. But when mutinous Arab tribesmen murdered the caliph Uthman in 656, the succession issue reemerged. It was resolved only after a civil war that left an enduring schism within the Islamic ummah. Ali was chosen to succeed the murdered Uthman. Next to the Prophet himself, Ali is the most revered of the founders of Islam: He was the Prophet's cousin, the husband of the Prophet's daughter Fatima, and one of the most dedicated of the early converts to Islam. Indeed, in some quarters of the ummah, the belief existed that Muhammad had intended for Ali to be his immediate successor. By the time he was finally selected as caliph, Ali represented a broad coalition of interests calling for greater equality among all Muslims, both Arab and non-Arab, and for the restoration of the leadership of the community to the house of Muhammad. But Mu‘awiyah, the powerful governor of Muslim Syria, contested Ali's right to the caliphate.

The forces of the two claimants to the leadership met at the battle of Siffin in 657. The results of the encounter were inconclusive, leaving both Ali and Mu‘awiyah in the same positions they had held before the battle. But in its aftermath, a substantial portion of Ali’s forces withdrew their support, allowing Mu‘awiyah to expand his power in Syria and Egypt and preventing Ali from establishing his uncontested right to the caliphate. Though Ali set up a capital in Kufa, one of the Arab garrison cities in lower Iraq, his position continued to deteriorate, and he was murdered in 661. Ali’s caliphate was short and divisive but far from inconsequential. It came to represent the validity of the legitimist position of authority within the Islamic ummah and, as we will see in later chapters, stood as an enduring symbol of the desire of a substantial minority of Muslims for a communal leader directly descended from the family of the Prophet. Indeed, attachment to the memory of Ali and his family and the tragedy associated with them was so passionate and vital that it gave rise to a permanent schism within the Islamic community.

FROM ARAB EXCLUSIVISM TO ISLAMIC UNIVERSALISM: THE UMAYYAD AND ABBASID EMPIRES

Ali’s passing marked the end of the first phase in the Islamic community’s development and the beginning of a new period of imperial expansion and consolidation. Mu‘awiyah was recognized as caliph throughout the empire and became the founder of the Umayyad dynasty (661–750). He was a pragmatic ruler whose principal concerns were continued expansion of Islam, management of the state’s resources, and consolidation of his dynasty. During his caliphate, the political center of the empire was transferred from Mecca to the ancient city of Damascus, with all its Byzantine associations. Mu‘awiyah adopted certain Byzantine administrative practices and employed former Byzantine officials and craftsmen, initiating the transformation of the Arab empire into a Byzantine successor state and surrounding the caliphate with the trappings of monarchy.

Although the conquests continued to bring material wealth to Damascus under Mu‘awiyah’s successors, internal dissension troubled the Umayyad Empire. The policy of Arab exclusivism, which the Umayyad ruling elite had adopted, was partly responsible for this. This ruling elite continued to equate Islam with Arab descent and to administer the empire's fiscal and social affairs in such a way as to favor the Arabs and to discriminate against the growing number of non-Arab converts to Islam. The discontent culminated in a revolution that overthrew the Umayyad house in 750 and brought to power a new dynasty—the Abbasids.

The office of the caliphate remained with the Abbasids from 750 to 1258. Under the Abbasids, the heroic age of the conquests gave way to the development of administrative institutions, commercial enterprises, and a legal system. The bureaucrat, the urban merchant, and the learned judge replaced the Arab warrior as the favored element in society. The consolidation of the conquests in the geographical center of a centuries-old mixture of cultural and religious traditions resulted in a complex interaction between the Middle East's existing cultures and religions and the dynamic infusion of energy from Arabia. The new and vibrant Islamic civilization arose found its first—but by no means its last—expression in the period of the high caliphate (750–945) of the Abbasid Empire.

The first 150 years of the Abbasid Empire, represented by such caliphs as al-Mansur (754–775), Harun al-Rashid (786–809), and al-Ma'mun (813–833), were a period of relative political stability, immense economic prosperity, and increasing universalism within the central Islamic domains. These conditions, in turn, allowed for the flowering of a rich and diverse civilization. The Abbasids abandoned the Arab exclusiveness that had generated so much discontent under the Umayyads. In its place, they adopted a universalist policy accepting the equality of all Muslims, regardless of their ethnic origins. This attitude, coupled with the revitalization of urban life and the expansion of commercial activity, led to a growing cosmopolitanism within the empire, as converts from among the conquered peoples participated fully in the economic and political life of the state.

The Abbasids' universalism was symbolized by yet another transfer of the imperial capital, this time to a newly created city, Baghdad, established by al-Mansur on the west bank of the Tigris. The change of location brought the Islamic political center into more direct contact with Iranian imperial traditions, with their emphasis on royal absolutism and bureaucratic specialization, and added yet another layer of influences to the Arab and Byzantine experiences of the Islamic state. Abbasid administration was modeled on Sasanian government and employed large numbers of converted Iranians in its increasingly elaborate bureaucratic structure. Sasanian practices also had an impact on the office of the caliphate. During the era of the Rashidun, the caliphs functioned as first among equals and lived modestly on the model established by Muhammad. This emphasis on simplicity changed under the later Umayyads, who distanced themselves from the population, took pleasure from the riches that flowed into the treasury at Damascus, and became less consultative and more authoritarian. The Abbasid rulers, with their more direct exposure to the Iranian idea of an absolute king of kings, carried the evolution of the caliphate to absolutist monarchy further than any of their predecessors. The Abbasid caliphs lived in luxurious palaces, isolated from all but their most trusted inner circle of courtiers and advisers. They came to identify themselves not simply as successors to the Prophet but as “shadows of God on earth,” and they exercised vast powers over their subjects. Thus, the Abbasid solution to the problem of political authority was to centralize it and to place it in the hands of an absolute monarch who exercised the powers of both secular king and spiritual head of the Islamic ummah. For nearly two centuries following the revolution of 750, the Abbasid formula worked fairly well; the widespread acceptance of its benefits brought to the empire unprecedented prosperity, dazzling intellectual achievement, and general political stability.

But no monarch could maintain absolute control of an empire that stretched from Morocco to India. In the late eighth century, North Africa slipped away from Baghdad’s authority and became a region of autonomous Islamic states. During the ninth century, independent and often short-lived dynasties rose and fell in various parts of Iran. Yet despite the emergence of new centers of power, the Abbasid caliphs remained the dominant rulers of the Middle East until the tenth century, and Baghdad’s imperial court set a style of royal behavior that was imitated in provincial capitals and breakaway dynasties throughout the vast territories in which Islam had become established.

CONCLUSION

In the short span of time from the Prophet Muhammad's death in 632 to the transfer of the imperial capital from Damascus to Baghdad in the 750s, the Islamic ummah had expanded from its Arab origins to embrace a universal world empire. The epoch of the Arab conquests is a decisive period in world history, one that transformed a nomadic desert population organized along tribal lines into the ruling elite of an imperial structure concentrated in the heartlands of classical antiquity. Arabic replaced Greek, Persian, Aramaic, and other established literary traditions as the language of administration and high culture, and Islam replaced—though it did not eliminate—Judaism, Christianity, Zoroastrianism, and paganism as the dominant religion in the Middle East. This process of replacement raises important questions. In its interaction with the existing literary, religious, and administrative traditions of Byzantium and Iran, how could the Islam of the revelations, the Islam of the Prophet's caravan city of Mecca, survive as a guide to administrative, economic, and social practices? How could the peoples living within the territories of the extensive Arab conquests, with their long-established traditions, be organized to obey the commands on proper human behavior that God revealed to a Meccan merchant in seventh-century Arabia? In developing answers to these questions or simply in developing certain patterns of living and worship, Muslims affirmed their belief in the validity of Muhammad's mission by creating a civilization centered on the revelations contained in the Quran.

CHAPTER 2

THE DEVELOPMENT OF ISLAMIC CIVILIZATION TO THE FIFTEENTH CENTURY

PATTERNS OF ISLAMIC HISTORY

Islamic history is sometimes treated as the rise and decline of the Abbasid Empire. In this version of the Islamic past, the chronological signposts are presented in the following manner. From 750 to 945, an absolutist empire centered in Baghdad experienced economic growth, cultural richness, and political stability that made it the world's dominant power. In 945 an Iranian military dynasty, the Buyids, took over temporal power in Baghdad, reducing the caliph to a figurehead and ensuring that the Iranian ruler exercised decision-making authority in the Abbasid Empire. According to this interpretation, the weaknesses that beset the Abbasids in the late tenth century caused Islam to enter into a long political and cultural decline that was intensified by the empire's destruction in 1258 and continued until the consolidation of the Ottoman Empire in the fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries.

This interpretation, however, with its exclusive focus on the Abbasid Empire and its linking of the decline of that empire with the decline of Islam, is misleading. Even when Abbasid power had peaked, other Islamic dynasties and cultures were rising. Their achievements were as important for the development of universal Islam as were those of the Abbasids. Marilyn Waldman has suggested that rather than viewing the Abbasid Empire as the core around which a series of lesser Islamic states revolved, we should instead think in terms of a group of regional Islamic empires, each of which developed a particular synthesis of local and Islamic practices.¹ Waldman's perspective emphasizes that at the same time Baghdad flourished, so too did distinctive and wealthy royal courts in Delhi, Ghazna, Cairo, Córdoba, and other regions. There was no single Islamic polity or culture that was tied to the fate of the Abbasids in Baghdad. The regional empires—or regional dynasties, as some call them—expanded and enriched Islamic traditions in areas beyond the Abbasid domains. Thus, although the fall of the Abbasid Empire in 1258 resulted in considerable political fragmentation, it did not lead to a “dark age” of Islamic culture or create a political vacuum in the central Islamic lands.

This is not to deny the important role Baghdad and other leading cities of the Abbasid Empire played in nurturing and disseminating Islamic legal, intellectual, political, and religious traditions. However, ideas that originated in Baghdad were often received and applied somewhat differently in the provincial capitals or in the cities of the other regional empires. Scholars who emphasize the significance of regional Islamic empires seek to demonstrate the existence of Islamic pluralism across time and space. Islamic societies were dynamic and diverse, not static and monolithic; they included areas as different as India and Syria, Egypt and Spain. It should again be stressed that the fate of the Abbasid Empire itself did not fully reflect the fate of Islam in the period from roughly AD 1000 to 1500. This is not to suggest that the late and post-Abbasid eras were without political turmoil or economic problems but rather that the durability of Islam as the first truly global civilization demonstrates the existence of a constant process of renewal from one Islamic region to another. Because Islam was universal, a period of stagnation in one segment of the ummah might be reversed by an infusion of intellectual, economic, or military energy from another. Thus, a constant process of renewal and preservation was taking place in various quarters of the Islamic world. There is no question that the destruction of the Abbasid Empire and the death of the last caliph were significant historical events, but we should not conclude that they marked the decline of Islamic civilization. The Abbasid successor states and the Islamic regional empires preserved and enriched Islamic cultural and religious traditions in the centuries after the sack of Baghdad.

THE CREATION AND USES OF WEALTH

The advent of the Abbasid Empire ushered in an era of economic prosperity that led to a revival of urban life and the expansion of trade and industry not only within the Abbasid domains but also throughout the world of Islam. Baghdad, nourished by the produce of the carefully controlled irrigation systems of the lower Tigris-Euphrates, grew into a huge cosmopolitan city whose population may have reached 1 million in the ninth century. The Abbasid capital formed the hub of a vast trading network that linked it to China, India, Africa, and the entire Mediterranean region (see Map 2.1). In bringing these diverse regions into sustained commercial contact with one another, Islamic merchants created an international market in which the products of India and Southeast Asia were exchanged for the goods of Spain and the Mediterranean lands. Cities became centers of production and consumption, and urban life flourished in bustling ports like Fustat, Almería in Spain, and Basra, the home of Sindbad the Sailor in the tales of the 1,001 Nights. The long-distance caravan trade revived existing inland cities such as Damascus and Aleppo and generated tremendous population and commercial growth in Marv, Samarkand, and Bukhara, the eastern cities that acted as way stations along the Silk Route to China. Merchants exploited the commercial opportunities of the expanding international marketplace to acquire huge fortunes. Their wealth gave them status and a prominent role in shaping the contours of the emerging Islamic society.

MAP 2.1 The lands of Islam at the beginning of the ninth century.

Increased agricultural production fostered the rise of large urban centers and contributed to the extraordinary prosperity that characterized the Islamic empires of the eighth through twelfth centuries. The growth in agriculture was made possible by the transfer of crops from India to the Middle East and the Mediterranean basin, a process that created the most significant agricultural revolution in world history between the adoption of sedentary agriculture and the European discovery of the Americas. Following the Arab conquest of Sind (Pakistan) in the early eighth century, crops from the subtropical climate of India were transported to the Fertile Crescent, Egypt, Africa, and Islamic Spain. In all of these regions, the newly introduced crops became such staples that we now tend to think of them as having been part of the cultivated landscape since classical antiquity. But Arabs brought such food crops as rice, sugarcane, lemons, limes, bananas, date palms, spinach, and eggplant as well as the industrial crop cotton from India to Iraq and then disseminated them across North Africa to Spain and other parts of Europe.

Through their conquests and settlement of diverse climatic regions and the establishment of trading networks connecting those regions, the Arabs, whose immediate pre-Islamic existence was not primarily associated with sedentary agriculture, acted as the catalysts for a powerful agricultural revolution. It would have an impact on the clothes people wore, the foods they consumed, and the ways in which the majority organized their working lives.

Their wealth from agriculture and commerce allowed Abbasid high society to surround themselves with luxuries of both regional and distant origin. A pattern of royal patronage benefited artisans, physicians, and writers, especially Arabic poets. Rich merchants and high-ranking functionaries in both Baghdad and the provincial capitals imitated this pattern. It contributed to the widespread florescence of a rich literary and scientific culture and imprinted on a certain segment of Islamic society the notion that to be great and powerful required more than an army; it also meant having a court of poets, scholars, and physicians. In the centuries to come, local rulers would nurture literature and learning even as they sought political separation from the Abbasid caliph, showing that their aspirations for power were firmly grounded in the high Islamic cultural tradition.

The intellectual adventure of high Islamic society was not limited to poetry and the decorative arts; ideas also spread along the caravan routes and sea lanes, and caliphs and princes recruited noted scholars to their courts. Muslim mathematicians, working within the Indian and Persian traditions, made lasting contributions to algebra (from the Arabic word al-jabr) and trigonometry. Muslim astronomers, physicians, and chemists produced works that influenced the development of the natural sciences in European as well as Muslim intellectual circles. The patronage of the Abbasid caliph al-Ma'mun (813–833) helped launch the movement that recovered the works of the noted Greek philosophers and physicians, among them Aristotle, Plato, and Galen, and translated them from Greek into Arabic in state-sponsored translation academies. The presence of the classical Greek tradition in Arabic editions compelled Muslim scholars to grapple with a human-centered philosophical tradition and produced two of the most noted Aristotelian commentators of the Middle Ages, Ibn Sina (Avicenna in Latin; 980–1037), a physician employed in a number of royal courts in eastern Iran, and Ibn Rushd (Averroës in Latin; 1126–1198), a Muslim jurist from Córdoba. The appearance of Arabic editions of Aristotle in regions as distant from one another as Spain and eastern Iran is evidence of the mobility of ideas within the global civilization of Islam.

The widespread manufacture and use of paper in the Islamic territories facilitated the diffusion of both secular ideas and Islamic religious doctrine. Paper manufacturing is generally believed to have originated in China in the first century BC. It entered the world of Islam following an Arab victory over a Chinese force east of the Aral Sea in 751. Among the prisoners taken in the clash were Chinese paper-makers who transmitted their skills to Muslim craftsmen. Introduced to Baghdad in the late eighth century, paper made its appearance in Spain by 900 at a time when Western societies still depended on papyrus and parchment. Within another century, paper manufacture would spread across the world of Islam.

From the eighth century onward, Islam became a global civilization in which knowledge, technology, and artistic tastes were transported back and forth across a vast domain. Because of the diversity and extent of the territories in which Islam became a prominent religious force, a variety of regional practices and interpretations imparted special characteristics to Islamic cultures in different parts of the world. No single political or cultural unit embraced the totality of Islam. Some scholars now point to the existence of several Islams coexisting in vibrant diversity yet united in acceptance of the message of the Quran and the core requirements of ritual. It is to those that we now turn.

ISLAMIC RITUALS AND INSTITUTIONS

The view that the organization of Islamic social and political life is based solely on revelations in the Quran is incorrect and ignores the complex historical evolution of Islam. From the first conquests under the Rashidun caliphs and continuing through the Abbasids, Islamic scholars made a sustained effort to accommodate the Quranic revelations to the traditions of the long-established cultures over which the caliphs came to rule. This effort at synthesis led to the elaboration of theology and the development of a comprehensive legal system based on the Quran but not restricted to it. At the popular level, the establishment of a universally accepted set of rituals provided Muslims with a sense of common identity and gave an Islamic dimension to their daily lives. Yet even as Islamic scholars sought to unify doctrine and ritual, the faith continued to attract a great diversity of peoples who brought to the emerging Islamic tradition a rich variety of cultural backgrounds and religious experiences. This interplay between unity and diversity was a constant feature of formative Islam; the faith was flexible enough to embrace new practices and accommodate regional variations but rigorous enough to preserve its core identity.

The Five Pillars of Faith

Islamic ritual is the institutionalized form through which all believers submit themselves to God and acknowledge his omnipotence. Although a discussion of ritual cannot convey to an outsider the true meaning of Islam for a practicing Muslim, it can provide insight into the exacting demands and the communal emphasis of Islamic worship. This worship is based on the five pillars of faith.

Proclamation of Faith (Shahadah). With the words “I attest that there is only one God and Muhammad is his Prophet,” Muslims affirm their faith in Islam. The basic religious principle of Islam is monotheism. The deity of the Quran is an all-powerful, righteous God of judgment whose commands are not to be questioned. The second element of the faith is the acceptance of Muhammad’s role as the final Prophet of God. According to the Quran, Muhammad was not only the transmitter of the divine message; he was designated as the Seal of the Prophets, the last in the long line of human beings who had received and transmitted God’s word. The Quran recognizes the missions of earlier prophets but contends that the commands they conveyed have been forgotten. Islam was therefore portrayed not as a new religion but as the revival of the true word of God that had been revealed to Abraham and to other prophets throughout human history. Over time, human beings, in their weakness, either ignored or perverted the revelations of these prophets. Through Muhammad, the all-merciful God for one last time revealed his will to his human creations. There would be no future opportunities to receive God’s plan; there would be no prophets after Muhammad. God’s designation of an Arab prophet and the Arabic language as the vehicles for his final revelation was of the utmost significance for the Arabs' sense of themselves and their role in human history.

Prayer (Salat). Muslims are instructed to perform the ritual prayer five times daily at intervals from dawn to sunset. During each rigorously prescribed set of movements and recitations, believers face in the direction of the holy Ka‘ba in Mecca and acknowledge total submission to God by touching their foreheads to the ground. The daily prayers are most often performed in the workplace or the home. On Friday, the Muslim day of communal worship, the noon prayer is the moment when the members of the ummah gather in the large congregational mosques.

Fasting (Sawm). The Quran commands all adult Muslims whose health permits to abstain from food, drink, and sexual activity from dawn to dusk during Ramadan, the month in which Muhammad received the first revelations. Fasting is a time of atonement and a reminder, through abstention, of God's generosity in providing for his human creations.

The Pilgrimage to Mecca (Hajj). Muhammad incorporated the Ka‘ba, the existing shrine of Mecca, into Islam and made it the key sanctuary of the new faith, associating its origins with the figure of Abraham. According to the Quran, Muslims should make the pilgrimage to Mecca and its shrine at least once in their lives, though the duty is most explicitly directed at those who can afford to undertake and take time off for the journey. The rites of pilgrimage are institutionalized; the ceremony occurs during a certain month and involves specific obligations. Throughout the centuries, the pilgrimage has served to remind Muslims the world over of their shared faith. The duty of the caliph, as the guardian of the holy cities, to keep the pilgrimage route safe is one of the most sacred administrative trusts.

Alms (Zakat). This duty is part of the concept of charity to the less fortunate that appears frequently in the revelations. Zakat is an annual wealth tax all Muslims must pay. Although the Quran does not specify the amount of the zakat, it developed in practice as 2.5 percent of a person's accumulated wealth and assets and was collected by the central treasury.

Jihad

The obligation of jihad, although not a formal part of ritual, constitutes an integral component of Islamic doctrine. The basic meaning of jihad is striving in the path of God. This can refer to an individual's inner struggle against sinful inclinations or to an exceptional effort for the good of the Islamic community. Certain modern Muslim writers have thus emphasized the need to internalize jihad in order to achieve religious reform. Late-twentieth- and early-twenty-first-century movements have invoked jihad as an instrument of political protest. These movements have defined the incumbent regimes, whether in Egypt or elsewhere, as irreligious and have claimed that it is, therefore, necessary to overthrow them by means of a popular jihad. In addition to its spiritual connotations, jihad means armed struggle against non-Muslims for the purpose of expanding or defending the territory under Muslim rule. Jihad, then, is a nuanced doctrine, and rendering it simply as "holy war" is incorrect and should be avoided.

The Shari'ah: The Integration of Religion and Society

The five pillars constitute the essential framework of Muslim worship. But the Quranic revelations were intended to direct all the affairs of the ummah, including relations among human beings. As the Islamic state expanded into a world empire, its leaders encountered new situations and adopted administrative practices not found in the Quran. How was the Quran, revealed in Mecca and Medina and responsive to the needs of those small Arabian cities, to be employed as the code of conduct for an empire stretching from Spain to Central Asia? Conversely, if the reason for the existence of the Islamic ummah was to ensure human conduct according to God's commands, how could the community justify practices not found in the Quran?

From the eighth through the tenth centuries, much of the intellectual energy of Muslim thinkers focused on these issues, with the aim of devising a uniform legal system that would recognize the requirements of imperial administration and the value of local customs while also remaining true to the concept of a community guided by divine revelation. The result was the compilation of the shari‘ah, the all-embracing sacred law of the Islamic community. The shari‘ah is not a single code of law; rather, it consists of four different sources to which legal experts may refer when assessing human actions. The first source is the Quran. But the Quran, though it sets forth clear moral guidelines and precise instructions on matters of marriage, divorce, and inheritance, does not address all of the practical legal issues that might arise in society. To fill in details not directly addressed in the Quran, Muslim jurists came to a consensus on the permissibility of employing three additional sources of law.

The first and most important of these is the tradition of the Prophet, known as sunnah. Muslim scholars agreed that because God had chosen Muhammad to receive the final revelation, he must have possessed exemplary human qualities. Therefore, Muhammad’s words and daily actions were taken as divinely approved guides for human conduct. This source of law became codified as scholars sifted through the many circulating stories (hadith) about Muhammad. Those accounts that could be verified on the basis of the reliability of the original eyewitness and of the individuals who later transmitted them were accepted as genuine, and legal experts used them in their assessment of proper conduct.

The second additional source of law is analogy (qiyas). When jurists encountered a situation for which there was no direct precedent in the Quran or hadith literature, they assessed it on the basis of principles previously accepted for a similar situation. The third supplementary source is the consensus of the community (ijma). As consensus developed in practice, it referred to decisions made by the leading scholars and jurists of the community. When they collectively agreed that certain practices were forbidden or permitted, their decisions became part of the shari‘ah. The exercise of applying informed human reasoning to points not covered in the Quran was known as ijtihad; it represented the right of learned scholars to interpret the intent of God’s revelations and provided Islamic jurisprudence with an evolutionary capability.

It is important to recognize that the three supplementary sources of law, even though they drew on human reasoning, are based on principles in the Quran and, thus, on God's will. The shari'ah is divine law intended to regulate all human activities and to empower Muslim jurists to assess the legality of individuals' actions on the basis of their compliance with God's commands.

The compilation of the shari'ah was accompanied by the parallel elaboration of a practical system of justice with courts, rules of evidence, and properly trained officials. The state appointed the judges (qadis) who presided over the shari'ah courts, and their application of the sacred law strengthened shari'ah-based norms within society. The office of qadi became so essential a component of Islamic societies that it virtually defined them as Islamic. Where there was a qadi, there was the presence of Islamic law.

The Role of the Ulama

It is often asserted that there is no priesthood in Islam. To the extent that there are no human intermediaries between the individual believer and God, this statement is correct. However, for a religion to survive and retain its vitality, there must exist individuals trained in doctrine and prepared to transmit it. In Islamic society this group is known as the ulama—literally, “those who know.” Because of Islam’s wide scope in regulating human affairs, the ulama perform a variety of functions. Because the governing law is God’s law, the scholars who compiled the shari'ah, the judges who applied it in the Islamic courts, and the legal experts who advised the judges were considered part of the ulama establishment, and because the most important form of knowledge was knowledge of religion, the teachers in the mosque schools and universities were also members of the ulama, as were the mosque preachers and the prayer leaders. This broadly based group of teachers, religious scholars, and legal functionaries occupied a central position in Islamic society. They were the guardians of the high scholarly tradition, the formulators of doctrine, the compilers of the shari'ah, and the transmitters of religious knowledge.

In the eleventh century the central government in Baghdad established a formal system of higher education designed to ensure uniform training for the ulama. The schools of instruction, called madrasahs, offered standardized training in Arabic, Islamic jurisprudence, Quranic exegesis, and the like. One result of this effort was to mold the ulama into a class committed to a standard orthodox vision of Islam and to the state that promised to uphold it. In addition, the spread of the madrasah system from Baghdad to other Islamic centers served to provide the ulama with a relatively standard form of training and thus contributed to the maintenance of a unified Islamic scholarly tradition.

Sufism

The learned Islamic tradition represented by the ulama, though providing a measure of uniformity to law and doctrine, did not necessarily fulfill popular religious needs. The Arab conquests brought peoples of such diverse local cultures and religious experiences into the ummah that a mingling of existing forms of worship with Islamic ritual was to be expected. The recognition that different manifestations of popular piety would have to be tolerated within the ummah was one of formative Islam's strengths. The official ulama establishment at first resisted but then accepted the existence of popular religious practices. However, the ulama persisted in their attempts to keep such practices within an Islamic frame of reference.

Sufism, or Islamic mysticism, embodies a rich variety of religious experiences. It began as an ascetic movement among individuals who opposed the worldliness and materialism of the Umayyad court in Damascus. During the ninth century, Sufism evolved into a devotional movement centered on the love of God. Sufi worship acquired ecstatic characteristics, and its practices spread among the population in the central Islamic lands. In place of the formal intellectualism of the ulama, Sufism represented emotional religious experience, an attempt to attain closer communion with God; in the Islamic context, this meant to come as close to God as Muhammad had done.

The development of Sufism followed a general pattern. Groups of devotees would gather around a local religious figure, whose stature was based on his or her ability to attain communion with God. Special ritual practices—breathing exercises, the chanting of phrases from the Quran, or physical movements such as rhythmic dancing—were intended to put the participant in a state to reach out to God. In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, Sufi groups who practiced the same ritual and followed the same master formed structured brotherhoods (tariqahs). Although most brotherhood organizations were local, several established regional branches, and a few set up networks throughout the world of Islam. In many locales the brotherhoods became the centers of communal volunteer activities, distributing food to the poor, organizing relief in times of famine or illness, and in general serving as a focal point of social as well as religious life. For the majority of Muslims, spiritual fulfillment was found in the Sufi experience. Just as the shari‘ah bound society together under a uniform legal system, the brotherhoods functioned as a structured subsystem in which diverse emotive practices found an outlet within an Islamic framework.

The Status of Women in the Quran

As with other features of Islam during its formative centuries, the social and legal status of women underwent considerable change. Moreover, women’s roles in society differed depending on their social class and geographic locale within the Islamic world. Although many variables shaped women’s roles, the Quran set forth guidelines intended to improve their status in seventh-century Arabia.

The Quranic reforms concentrated on the areas of marriage, divorce, and inheritance. In pre-Islamic Arabia, women were sold to their husbands by their family or tribe in exchange for a dowry. The Quran prohibited this practice by making the dowry payable to the bride alone, not to her family, thus giving women the legal right to own material wealth. In addition, the wife was allowed to keep the dowry even if the marriage ended in divorce. Another marriage reform contained in the Quranic injunction restricted to four the number of wives a man could have and the admonition that if a husband feared he could not treat each of his wives equally, he should marry only one. This proclamation is often misunderstood because it is not placed in historical context. Polygamy was unlimited in pre-Islamic Arabia, and the Quranic prohibition against taking more than four wives was indeed a reform.

Before Islam's advent, divorce was an unregulated male prerogative among the Arabs of the peninsula. Quranic legislation managed to curtail husbands' unbridled rights to divorce their wives, but husbands were still able to repudiate their wives without stating a cause, a practice that sustained male domination in marriages. Women, who had no divorce rights in pre-Islamic times, did acquire them through the shari'ah. However, a wife's ability to initiate divorce remained limited and involved far more complex legal processes than prevailed for husbands.

In the realm of inheritance, the regulations of the Quran instituted major advances for women. Whereas before Islam, women were completely excluded from inheriting, the Quran decreed that wives, daughters, sisters, and grandmothers were entitled to fixed shares of the deceased's estate. Although women's proportion of the estate was less than men's entitlement, the very act of granting women legal status as inheritors represented a profound change. Women were acknowledged as having economic rights and were therefore given legal status within the community of Islam.

Notwithstanding the Quran's reformist attitude toward gender relationships, the divine revelations did not accord women equal status with men. For example, the Quran stated that "men are the managers of the affairs of women for that God has preferred in bounty one of them over another" (Sura 4). And as the expansion of Islam brought the Arabs into contact with other cultures and required them to adapt to urban life, the reformist tendencies of the Quran were abandoned. In the regulations of the shari'ah as well as in the customs of everyday life, the status of women declined.

TWO VERSIONS OF LEADERSHIP: SUNNI CALIPH AND SHI'A IMAM

The Islamic community has two major branches, Sunnis and Shi'as (or Shi'ites). The fundamental difference between them is over who should hold the political leadership of the Islamic community and what the religious dimension of that leadership should be. Sunni Muslims accept the legality of the selection of the Rashidun caliphs and their successors, the Umayyads and the Abbasids. They acknowledge the caliphs as mortal beings with no divine powers. Thus, although the caliphs represented the religious leadership of the community, their authority was temporal, and they left matters of doctrine and jurisprudence to the ulama. The caliphs were responsible for upholding the shari‘ah and ensuring that opportunities for the fulfillment of an Islamic way of life prevailed within the community. The term Sunni is derived from the word sunnah, meaning tradition or custom, and it is used in this context to refer to Muslims who followed community custom. Sunnis constitute the vast majority of Muslims in the world and are sometimes designated as orthodox Muslims, though that definition is misleading.

The Shi‘as contend that with the exception of Ali and his descendants, all of the caliphs were usurpers. They also hold a much different view from the Sunnis of which religious functions the leader of the community is empowered to exercise. Although Shi‘a doctrine was elaborated over several centuries, the core of the Sunni–Shi‘a split originated in the years immediately following the Prophet Muhammad’s death.

As discussed above, disputes over the succession to the caliphate led to a Muslim civil war that pitted the supporters of Ali, the Prophet’s cousin and son-in-law, against the forces of Mu‘awiyah, the founder of the Umayyad dynasty. Although the war produced no clear victor, Ali’s murder in 661 enabled Mu‘awiyah to secure his claim to the caliphate and to make certain that his son, Yazid, succeeded him. During the first year of Yazid’s reign (680), the Shi‘a (partisans) of Ali persuaded Ali’s son, Husayn, to lead a rebellion against the Umayyads. In the Shi‘a version of the history of this episode, Husayn was motivated by a desire to reverse the secularizing and materialist tendencies of the Umayyads and to redirect the community along the path Muhammad had prescribed for it. But the popular support Husayn had been promised failed to materialize, and in 680 Umayyad forces killed the grandson of the Prophet and his small band of followers at the town of Karbala in Iraq.

This was a seminal event in the development of Shi‘ism: Shi‘as viewed Husayn’s rebellion as a protest against Umayyad tyranny, and his death took on the aura of martyrdom. Karbala developed into the holiest shrine of Shi‘ism, and the annual rites of mourning for Husayn at that site became the most important religious ceremony in the Shi'a calendar. From a doctrinal perspective, Husayn's death became a symbol of the suffering to which the forces of oppression had subjected the Prophet's family and the usurpation of that family's right to rule. Husayn's martyrdom thus solidified the Shi'as' belief that the individuals most qualified to hold supreme political authority over the Islamic community were the descendants of the Prophet through the line of Ali and his wife, Fatima, the Prophet's daughter. The Shi'as hold that Muhammad had selected Ali as his successor and that each of the Shi'a leaders (Imams) since that time had designated his successor before his death. This process was continuous from Ali, regarded as the first Imam, to the twelfth Imam, who, as explained below, has been ascribed a major part in Shi'a Islam.

As Shi'a doctrine evolved after Husayn's martyrdom, it accorded the Imams a special religious role that the Sunni caliphs did not have. Shi'ism maintains that Muhammad was granted divine inspiration, which he in turn transmitted to Ali and was then passed to the designated Imams after him. Even though Sunni dominance prevented these Imams from exercising political authority, Shi'as consider them the vessels through which God provided his uninterrupted guidance to human society. The Shi'a Imams are regarded as having been divinely inspired; they possessed esoteric knowledge not granted to other humans, including knowledge of the hidden meanings of the Quran, and they were therefore able to offer infallible pronouncements on religious law and to provide interpretations that reflected changing circumstances.

Shi'a doctrine took on added complexity and added importance for the history of the modern Middle East by the way it interpreted events involving the twelfth Imam, Muhammad al-Mahdi. According to the majority Shi'a position, sometimes called Twelver Shi'ism, the twelfth Imam entered into a condition of occultation in the year 874. He disappeared but did not die; he was—and, over eleven centuries later, remains—concealed by God. At some point before the Day of Judgment, he will return as the Mahdi, the expected one, and will fill the earth with justice.

Shi'a doctrine accords al-Mahdi the status of the Hidden Imam who, because he is still alive, continues to exercise control over human affairs. However, this notion posed both political and religious problems for the Shi'a community: How was the community to be guided in the absence of the Hidden Imam? How was his divine inspiration to be communicated to his followers? Chapter 6 examines the process by which the Shi'a ulama in Iran established their claim to represent the Hidden Imam, a claim that had important consequences for the shaping of modern Iranian society.

The followers of another version of Shi'ism, known as Isma'ilis, or Seveners, differ from the Twelvers in their interpretation of the line of succession between the seventh and eighth Imams. They contend that the imamate has continued uninterrupted to the present day, and they follow the Agha Khan as their infallible Imam.

THE MIDDLE EAST FROM THE ELEVENTH TO THE FIFTEENTH CENTURIES: AN OVERVIEW

During the eleventh century, military power and the ruling authority that went with it passed from Arabs to Turks in the central Islamic lands. Turkish pastoral nomads from Asia had been in contact with Islam from the early period of the Arab conquests, and Turks had served as professional soldiers in the armies of various Abbasid caliphs. Several of the Turkish tribes on the frontier of settlement along the Oxus River had adopted Sunni Islam; when they eventually entered the central Islamic territories, they did so as defenders of the faith, not as agents of its destruction.

By the middle of the eleventh century, a confederation of Turkish tribes known as the Seljuks had established domination over Iran, and in 1055 the Abbasid caliph invited the Seljuk leader to assume administrative and military authority in Baghdad. The Turkish Seljuks became the lieutenants of the caliph and the defenders of the high Islamic tradition. In this capacity, the Seljuk sultans (temporal rulers) created a huge empire stretching from northeastern Iran through the Arab lands. In the period of Seljuk ascendancy, other Turkish tribes migrated westward and established a permanent Turkish presence in northwestern Iran and the Caucasus region. Following the Seljuks' defeat of the Byzantine army at the battle of Manzikert in 1071, these migrating tribes moved into Anatolia and gradually transformed that land from a Greek-speaking Christian territory to a Turkish-speaking Muslim one.

However, the Seljuks were unable to maintain lasting central authority over the territories under their control. By 1157 their empire had broken up into a series of smaller successor states mainly ruled by Seljuk princes. But the Seljuk period had lasting importance; it demonstrated the absorptive qualities of Islam, as the Turks adjusted quickly to urban life and adopted the high cultural traditions of Islam, such as patronage of the arts, sponsorship of architecture, and respect for the shari‘ah and the ulama. In addition, the Seljuks were responsible for a rejuvenation of Sunni Islam; it was the Seljuk minister Nizam al-Mulk who founded the madrasah system of state-sponsored education for the ulama. Moreover, the Seljuks expanded the domains of Islam into eastern Anatolia, thus laying the groundwork for the emergence of the Ottoman state, the most imposing of all the Islamic empires.

Following the breakup of the Seljuk Empire, western Iran and the central Arab lands were divided among several ruling dynasties. Although not major powers, these states commanded sufficient resources to enable their princes to maintain luxurious courts and continue offering patronage to poets and scholars. It was in this politically fragmented Middle Eastern world of the eleventh and twelfth centuries that the European Crusaders made their first appearance and established the four Latin kingdoms of Edessa, Antioch, Tripoli, and Jerusalem. But after slightly less than 200 years of troubled occupation of the region and the launching of several Crusades, the Europeans were ejected from the eastern Mediterranean. Except for sparking a spirit of resistance and cooperation among rulers in Syria and Egypt, whose combined efforts led to the Crusaders’ defeat, the Crusades had a minimal influence.

A far more serious threat to the Islamic world arose from the east. During the thirteenth century, Islamic lands from India to Syria suffered the effects of Mongol subjugation. Unlike the Arab conquests of the seventh and eighth centuries, which brought a new religious and social order, or the Seljuk expansion in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, which invigorated existing Islamic institutions, the Mongol invasions appeared to have little purpose beyond conquest and destruction; indeed, they devastated Iraq and Iran. The first wave of invasions came in the 1220s under Genghis Khan, whose armies vanquished the key commercial cities of Samarkand and Bukhara and brought all of Iran under Mongol influence. In 1256 Genghis

Khan's son Hülagü launched another Mongol campaign against the west; his objective was to conquer all of the Islamic lands as far as Egypt. Hülagü's forces defeated the caliph's army in 1258 and then sacked Baghdad and killed the Abbasid caliph, thus toppling the institution that had symbolized universal Islam for 500 years. The Mongol destruction of Baghdad also ended that city's role as a commercial and intellectual hub. After 1258, the once-thriving imperial capital was reduced to the status of a provincial city, and its population, economy, and influence declined precipitously.

Hülagü did not achieve his ambition of conquering Egypt. In 1260 the forces of the Mamluks, a new Turkish military sultanate based in Cairo, defeated the Mongols in a battle north of Jerusalem. The victorious Mamluks became the masters of Syria and ruled it and Egypt until 1517. Mamluk dominion was sometimes turbulent, but its persistence for over 250 years shows again the significance of the Turkish role in governing Middle Eastern Islamic states from the eleventh century onward.

The Mamluk defeat of Hülagü's forces did not end the invasions from the east. From 1381 to 1404, the armies of Timur Lang (Tamerlane) laid waste to large portions of Iran, defeated the Turkish princes of Anatolia, and sacked Damascus. Although Timur conquered vast territories, he did not construct a stable empire. Following his death in 1405, Anatolia and the Arab lands again split into several small dynastic states.

CONCLUSION

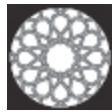

Following the military victories of the Arab warriors, the Quraysh administrators and merchants consolidated the conquests and ensured that the production and distribution of resources in the conquered territories were not unduly disturbed. Local customs were often allowed to continue, and certain existing practices were incorporated into the Islamic tradition. But throughout this pragmatic creation of an empire, an Islamic impulse guided the organization of state and society. The irreverent behavior of some elites could not disrupt the desire of society at large to sustain the concept of the ummah espoused by Muhammad. The Quran's moral imperatives were elaborated upon and formed the core of the shari'ah, a sacred legal system that made everyday activities religious duties. Overseeing the enforcement of the shari‘ah and the purity of doctrine were the ulama, a class of scholars, judges, and teachers who set and transmitted the norms by which Islamic society perpetuated itself. On a popular level, religious expression found outlets in the Sufi brotherhoods and the rituals associated with them.

The Mongol invasions rocked but did not destroy the existing Islamic order in the Middle East. Out of the chaos and instability of the fourteenth and early fifteenth centuries, there emerged in the territory from Anatolia to India three substantial Islamic empires that stabilized political conditions in the central Islamic lands, reshaped and reinvigorated cultural and religious life, and propelled Islam into a new era of expansion and splendor.

CHAPTER 3

THE OTTOMAN AND SAFAVID EMPIRES

A New Imperial Synthesis

During the sixteenth century, the Mongol-ravaged central Islamic lands recovered their political unity and cultural vitality. A new imperial synthesis developed, represented by the Mughal Empire of Delhi in the east, the Safavid Empire of Iran in the center, and the Ottoman Empire in the west. Each of these empires was an expansive Islamic state, and each made lasting cultural, political, and social contributions to its home region. The emergence of these three states demonstrates that Islam had not reached the limits of its expansion during the classical Abbasid caliphate. Marshall Hodgson has written that a visitor from Mars to Earth during the sixteenth century would probably have concluded that the world was on the verge of becoming Muslim. This impression would reflect partly the extent of Islam and partly the power and prosperity of the three central Islamic empires.

The Mughal Empire, whose most familiar architectural monument is the stunning Taj Mahal, lies outside the scope of this book, but its existence evidences the emergence of a new Islamic imperial synthesis in the sixteenth century. Although the Safavid Empire of Iran collapsed in 1736, the success of its rulers in establishing Shi‘ism as the state religion has had far-reaching significance for the entire Middle East. The Ottoman Empire provides a continuous link from the sixteenth to the twentieth century. For the 400 years spanning 1517 to the end of World War I, the Ottoman Empire ruled the central Middle East. Ottoman administrative institutions and practices shaped the peoples of the modern Middle East and left an enduring legacy. At its peak, the Ottoman Empire was a European as well as a Middle Eastern power, and its long rule over the Balkans and its role in Great Power diplomacy have also left a lasting mark on European history.

THE RISE OF THE OTTOMAN EMPIRE

The future Ottoman Empire originated as one of over a dozen small Anatolian principalities that arose in the wake of the Mongol invasions of the thirteenth century (see Chapter 2). These Turkish principalities were Islamic warrior states whose ongoing military confrontations with Christian Byzantium were inspired by religious motives as well as by a desire for material gain. The tradition of gaza warfare against non-Muslims for the purpose of extending the domains of Islam was a driving force among the Muslim frontier warriors (gazis), and the gazi spirit would decisively shape the Ottoman Empire. An Ottoman poet of the fifteenth century described a gazi as “the instrument of the religion of God, a servant of God who purifies the earth from the filth of polytheism; the gazi is the sword of God, he is the protector and the refuge of the believers. If he becomes a martyr in the ways of God, do not believe that he has died—he lives in beatitude with God, he has eternal life.”¹ But the gazi ethos was not the only motivating factor among the frontier warriors; the drive to acquire the spoils of war and to achieve temporal power also inspired the tribesmen and their chieftains. The tribal leaders were as likely to attack a rival Muslim force as they were to assault a Byzantine frontier post.

Although the gazi forces were mainly tribal, the rulers of the Turkish principalities attempted to imitate the court life of settled Islamic empires. Specifically, they practiced patronage, appointed shari‘ah judges to ensure proper application of the law, and established institutions of Islamic learning. The admixture of the gazis’ freewheeling frontier warfare and their chieftains’ efforts to adopt the practices of high Islamic tradition was another factor that shaped the Ottoman Empire.

The beginnings of the Ottoman state are usually traced to the achievements of the Turkish chieftain Osman, the ruler of a small gazi principality. During the early 1300s, Osman's gazi warriors achieved a series of military successes against the Byzantine forces. These victories attracted other chieftains and tribesmen to Osman's realm. The growing military power at Osman's disposal enabled him and his son Orhon to expand their domains in northwestern Anatolia. In 1326 Orhon captured the city of Bursa from the Byzantines and made it the capital of his emerging state. He asserted his independent authority by striking his own coins, and he affirmed the Islamic impulse behind his conquests by founding a madrasah and constructing a mosque that bore an inscription describing him as "gazi, son of gazi." As Orhon's gazi principality made the transition from a frontier society to an established state, his subjects came to be known by his family name, Osmanlis (Ottomans). The sense of belonging to a single dynastic house created a solidarity and loyalty that gradually transcended tribal affiliations.

By the middle of the fourteenth century, the Ottomans had expanded to the shores of the Sea of Marmara; across the water lay Christian Europe, which had always been beyond the reach of Islamic rulers. They were not beyond the reach of the Ottomans, however. Over the next two centuries, all of southeastern Europe came under direct Ottoman control. The Ottoman expansion of the fourteenth to the sixteenth centuries was no less remarkable than the Arab conquests 700 years earlier. Not only did the Ottomans add new European territories to the domains of Islam; they also extended their rule to the Arab lands where Islam had originated.

Three successful military campaigns illustrate the transformation of the Ottoman state into a world power. The first was the conquest of Constantinople, an achievement that had eluded Muslim commanders throughout the centuries. On May 29, 1453, following a long siege, the forces of Sultan Mehmet II ("the Conqueror") entered the Byzantine capital and brought an end to Constantinople's role as the symbolic center of eastern Christendom. Henceforth known as Istanbul, the city became the seat of the Ottoman government and was restored to its former splendor by Mehmet II's program of reconstruction and repopulation. Inhabitants throughout the Ottoman domains were encouraged—sometimes forced—to resettle in Istanbul, and by the end of Mehmet's reign in 1481, the city was home to over 100,000 people and again a thriving metropolis.

By the late sixteenth century, Istanbul, with a population exceeding 700,000, was Europe's largest city. It was also architecturally breathtaking. Mehmet II and his successors undertook lavish building programs that endowed Istanbul with monumental religious structures and palaces and made its appearance worthy of the capital of the era's leading Islamic empire. During the sixteenth century, the royal architect Sinan perfected the classical Ottoman style, with its vast domes, towering pencil minarets, and geometric complexes. Istanbul's visual monumentality powerfully symbolized Ottoman wealth and ascendancy.

The occupation of Istanbul provided the Ottomans with an unparalleled strategic base from which to dominate the Black Sea and the eastern Mediterranean. However, to take full advantage of their position, the Ottomans required a navy; without one, they could not wrest control of maritime commerce from the well-established Italian city-states, notably Venice. Accordingly, Mehmet the Conqueror ordered the construction of shipyards in Istanbul and gathered skilled carpenters, merchants, and sailors from the coastal regions. These efforts forged an Ottoman navy that eventually drove Venice from the eastern Mediterranean and established the Ottomans as the supreme maritime power from the Adriatic to the Black Sea. The fleet's creation also enabled the Ottomans to conquer and occupy the principal strategic Mediterranean islands from Rhodes (1522) and Cyprus (1570) in the east to Crete (1664) in the center and to extend their control over North Africa with the conquest of Algiers (1529) and Tunis (1574).

Meanwhile, improvements in the Ottoman land army made it the most formidable military force of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. At the heart of Ottoman military superiority were the development and extensive use of gunpowder weapons. As early as 1453, Mehmet II had deployed huge siege guns to breach the walls of Constantinople. In the decades that followed, the Ottomans adapted artillery technology to serve their special needs, notably by developing light field guns that could be transported on wagons to distant battlefields. These guns devastated the feudal armies of Europe, whose infantrymen fought mainly with pikes. In addition, the Ottomans equipped their own infantry, the Janissaries (discussed in the next section), with gunpowder weapons to such an extent that in the sixteenth century, they deployed more firearms than any other armed force in the world. Exploiting these technical advantages, the Ottoman armed forces defeated the armies of Europe and the Middle East in campaign after campaign. But superior weapons technology and combat training were not the sole reasons for Ottoman military success; according to recent studies, the Ottoman commissariat was highly advanced in comparison to that of its adversaries. Consequently, Ottoman troops were better and more regularly fed than other armies of the time.

Although the Ottomans concentrated on expansion in Christian Europe, they also sent their armies to the east to repel the advances of the Safavid Empire of Iran. These campaigns represent the second example of the growth of Ottoman world power. (The Ottoman-Safavid struggle is examined later in this chapter.) When Sultan Selim I led the Ottoman army on an eastern campaign in 1516, his objective appeared to be the occupation of the Safavid imperial capital at Tabriz. However, he decided instead to neutralize the threat posed by another regional rival, the Mamluk Empire, which was centered in Egypt but also controlled Syria and certain territories in southern Anatolia. The efficient Ottoman military easily drove the Mamluks out of Syria, and in early 1517, Selim marched his forces across the Sinai Peninsula and captured Cairo. This swift action resulted in the Ottoman acquisition of most of the classical heartlands of Arab Islam and brought about the integration of Arab and Ottoman Islamic traditions.

The Ottoman conquest of the Arab lands established the sultans as the supreme rulers within the universal Islamic community. Recognized as the protectors of the holy cities of Mecca and Medina, they therefore assumed the important duty of ensuring the security of the annual pilgrimage. To fulfill this responsibility and also to contain the expansive Portuguese seaborne commercial empire, Selim ordered the creation of a Red Sea fleet. Although the Ottomans proved unable to compete with the Portuguese in the Indian Ocean, their domination of Egypt allowed them to establish hegemony in the Red Sea and to incorporate Yemen into their empire. In addition to having commercial and strategic benefits, Selim's occupation of Egypt enhanced the Islamic standing of the Ottoman sultans by enabling them to gain access to the title of caliph. According to legend, a member of the Abbasid ruling house escaped the Mongol destruction of Baghdad in 1258 and made his way to Cairo, where he and his descendants were sheltered by the Mamluks and recognized as legitimate caliphs. Following the Ottoman conquest of Egypt, the reigning caliph was taken to Istanbul and allegedly transferred the title to Selim and his successors in the Ottoman dynasty. However, the sultans did not make extensive use of this rather questionable right to the caliphate until the nineteenth century, when they resurrected the legend of the transfer in order to obtain universal Muslim support for their attempts to ward off European imperialism.

The third example of successful Ottoman expansion concerns the European campaigns of Sultan Süleyman the Magnificent (1520–1566), the most powerful of the Ottoman rulers. Primarily a gazi-inspired sultan, Süleyman concentrated on pushing the Ottoman frontier ever deeper into Europe. In 1520 Süleyman led the Ottoman forces in the capture of the key fortress city of Belgrade, which became the primary staging ground for subsequent Ottoman campaigns. During the rest of the 1520s, Budapest and most of Hungary were brought under Ottoman control. Then, in 1529, Süleyman shocked Christendom by marching an Ottoman army across the Danube and laying siege to Vienna, the Hapsburg imperial capital and the gateway to central Europe. Although the outskirts of Vienna were destroyed and the city walls were partly breached, the defenders held out until the threat of winter forced the Ottomans to withdraw to Istanbul. In the years to come, Süleyman's European campaigns consolidated Ottoman rule in Hungary and Serbia, but the sultan was unable to mount another siege of Vienna. Central Europe was beyond the limits of Ottoman territorial expansion. However, the area that did lie within those limits was so extensive—from the Danube to Yemen, from Albania to the northern shores of the Black Sea, and from Algiers to Baghdad—that the Ottoman Empire, at Süleyman's death in 1566, was the major European, Mediterranean, Middle Eastern, and Persian Gulf power. It was not only the leading Islamic state of the sixteenth century; it was also a vast world empire (see Map 3.1).

OTTOMAN RULING INSTITUTIONS AND ATTITUDES

The Ottoman sultans ruled over an absolutist, bureaucratic, agrarian-based empire. However, it must be emphasized that an empire as large, diverse, and long-lasting as the Ottoman did not have a single, unchanging system of administration; indeed, one reason for the Ottomans' success was their official recognition that the diversity of their subject territories required flexible administrative practices that could accommodate the needs of different regions and cultures. Modern scholarship has identified Ottoman rule with such terms as plasticity, adaptability, and pragmatism. It is important for students of the modern Middle East to recognize the skills the Ottoman ruling class employed to entrench among the subject peoples of the empire an appreciation for the benefits of Ottoman rule; this appreciation, though severely tested, continued into the twentieth century.

The principles that shaped the ruling Ottoman elites' attitude toward state and society came from four basic sources. One was the tradition of gaza, holy war against non-Muslims for the purpose of expanding Islamic domains. Note, however, that the earlier historiographical emphasis on the religious impulse as the single driving force behind Ottoman expansionism must now be modified by an appreciation of other factors. In particular, the first Ottoman armies to cross the Sea of Marmara into southeastern Europe comprised substantial contingents of Greek Christian mercenaries who, like the Ottoman gazis that accompanied them, "followed the Ottoman standard not for God, but for gold and glory.”² Thus, the Ottoman policy of empire building was buttressed by Islam, but included pragmatic temporal considerations as well.

The second principle shaping Ottoman rule was the legacy of urban Islamic civilization, which included the notion of dynasty, monarchical patronage of scholars, and a belief in the ruler’s responsibility for instituting and enforcing Islam’s laws and values. The Ottoman sultans accepted their Islamic duties by implementing the shari‘ah and establishing an Islamic legal system throughout the empire. In addition, they assumed the role of protectors of the universal Islamic community, a role highlighted after the Ottomans took over the administration of such venerated Islamic cities as Jerusalem, Damascus, and Baghdad as well as the holy places of Mecca and Medina.

A third principle influencing the organization of society was local custom. Ottoman officials developed a shrewd sense of what needed to be changed in the conquered territories and what should be allowed to remain. Any provincial governor whose policies were so heavy-handed that his province rose up in rebellion was as deserving of dismissal as a lenient governor who failed to produce sufficient revenue. As long as taxes were remitted and stability was maintained, the Ottomans were content to tolerate a wide variety of local practices. This attitude gave rise to an administrative and fiscal mosaic in which subtle shades of difference existed. In this context, it has been accurately noted that the Ottomans were more interested in efficiency than uniformity. But it was precisely this administrative flexibility that enabled the Ottomans to rule for so long over territories as diverse as Serbia and Egypt or Syria and Greece.

The fourth principle that molded Ottoman governing attitudes was the division of society into rulers and ruled. The latter, referred to as reaya, a term denoting subjects, produced, through labor and taxes, the wealth that supported the ruling elite. The state had few obligations toward its subjects aside from the need to ensure conditions of stability and order so that the subjects would be able to generate this wealth. The Ottoman ruling elite were called askeris—literally, the military. However, in practice, the ruling class included high-ranking civilian officials and members of the ulama as well as the military. The ruling elite enjoyed special privileges—most importantly, tax exemptions.

Within the ruling elite was a special group of educated individuals who have been called the true Ottomans. Members not only served the state in high-ranking positions but also practiced the norms of behavior required of a cultivated, well-bred class. This included having knowledge of Ottoman Turkish, a complex amalgam of Arabic, Persian, and Turkish written in the Arabic script. A true Ottoman was also familiar with the Islamic cultural tradition and could read the Quran in Arabic. Although Turkish military chieftains founded the Ottoman Empire, its ruling elite adopted a cosmopolitan outlook and regarded themselves as cultured Ottoman Muslims. The term Turk took on pejorative connotations and was used to refer disparagingly to illiterate peasants.

At the pinnacle of the Ottoman hierarchy was the sultan-caliph, an absolute monarch whose right to rule was derived from his membership in the house of Osman and his ability to defeat rival claimants to the throne. Succession did not automatically go to the eldest son but rather was contested among the royal princes. During the first four centuries of Ottoman rule, the royal princes received military and administrative training in the various provinces of Anatolia. Each was trained as if he would be the next sultan; each had an equal claim to the throne. When the reigning sultan died, the power struggle began as the contending princes rushed toward Istanbul. The first to secure the support of the royal court and the imperial guard in the capital city was proclaimed sultan. To prevent continuing rival claims to the throne, the Ottomans adopted the practice of fratricide; once the victorious prince had assumed the office of sultan, he ordered his brothers killed. Justification for the custom was encapsulated in the Ottoman political statement that “the death of a prince is less regrettable than the loss of a province.” In the seventeenth century fratricide was discontinued, as was the program of training the princes before they assumed the throne. As a result, several later sultans were raised within the cloistered walls of the royal palace and had no governing experience prior to becoming rulers.

As the Ottoman state evolved from a gazi principality to a bureaucratic world empire, the sultans instituted an imperial council, or divan, to deal with the increasingly complex affairs of government. The members of the divan were responsible for advising the sultan on the military, administrative, and judicial affairs of the empire and were among the highest-ranking members of the true Ottoman elite. Presiding over the divan was the grand vizier, the most powerful government official. The absolute deputy of the sultan, he acquired the right to exercise executive authority in the sultan's name. During the reigns of weak sultans, the grand viziers sometimes assumed extensive powers and made decisions without consulting the monarch.

The Ottoman ruling elite comprised three major groupings: the military, the civil service, and the religious establishment. Before we consider these groupings, however, it is necessary to examine the unique slave system that provided the manpower for much of the ruling elite.

The Ottoman Slave Elite

In the fourteenth century, the Ottomans institutionalized a method for procuring slaves from among their European Christian subjects. Known as the devshirme (collecting) system, it involved a levy every few years on adolescent male Christian children from the empire's European provinces. Through this system the Ottomans tapped the vast manpower reserves of their European Christian provinces and placed them in state service. Removed from their families and taken to Istanbul, the children were converted to Islam, tested and screened, and then trained for service in the empire. The devshirme system procured soldiers for the infantry corps while also providing the Ottoman state with its top-ranking military commanders and civilian administrators.

With the exception of the religious establishment and the middle and lower levels of the bureaucracy, which were composed entirely of free Muslims, the sultan's slaves ran the Ottoman ruling institutions. The most promising young men taken in the devshirme levy attended special schools within the royal palace complex, where they underwent years of training designed to prepare them for leadership as the Ottoman ruling class. They studied Persian, Arabic, and Ottoman Turkish, and they learned calligraphy and painting as well as military strategy and weapon handling. A sixteenth-century European observer described the palace schools as agents for producing a “warrior, statesman, and loyal Muslim” who was at the same time “a man of letters and a gentleman of polished speech, profound courtesy and honest morals.”³

The individuals who successfully completed their palace training were appointed to the most responsible military and administrative positions within the empire. From the mid-fifteenth to the mid-seventeenth centuries, virtually all of the grand viziers, the sultan’s designated deputies, were converted Christians taken in the devshirme levy and trained in the palace system. Most other high-ranking ministers, members of the divan, provincial governors, and leading military commanders had similar backgrounds. They managed the affairs of the empire and led its armies, yet they were all slaves of the sultan. (In a sense, the term “slaves” is misleading, because the devshirme system is so unlike the chattel slavery practiced in the Americas.) These warrior-statesmen acquired vast wealth, wielded immense power, had household slaves of their own, and married women of their own choosing. Importantly, though, their power derived from the will of the sultan; they were his creatures, his bondsmen, and he could dismiss and punish them as he chose.

The devshirme levy and the palace training system succeeded in severing young adolescents’ ties with their places of origin and creating a trained cadre of officials who were dependent on the sultan and thus totally loyal to him. Their rise in the Ottoman system was determined largely by their own talents (with help from a patron or two), not on the standing of their families. In this way, the infusion of newly trained and newly committed warrior-statesman-slaves constantly renewed the Ottoman elite. Because it was forbidden to enslave a freeborn Muslim, the system did not allow for hereditary positions—the offspring of these converted high-ranking officials were regarded as full-fledged Muslims and were, in theory, excluded from holding positions in the Ottoman hierarchy that were reserved for the sultan’s slaves. The Ottoman slave system offered limitless opportunities to the young men who became a part of it; indeed, there are recorded instances of Christian—and Muslim—parents attempting to arrange for their sons to be taken in the devshirme levies.

The Military

The Janissary Infantry. The two main branches of the Ottoman armed forces came from quite different sources. The most efficient imperial military unit was the professional standing infantry corps known as the Janissaries. They composed a slave army that, at its peak in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, was the outstanding military unit in Europe. Known for their discipline, morale, and professionalism, the Janissaries were paid regular salaries and were expected to be ready for military duty at all times. Forbidden to marry or to engage in trade, they were quartered in barracks and, when not on active campaigns, frequently deployed to maintain domestic law and order. By the time of Süleyman the Magnificent, the Janissary corps numbered around 40,000 troops and had expanded from an infantry force to include specialized artillery units.

Sipahi Cavalry. The provincial cavalrymen, or sipahis, and their retainers made up the bulk of the Ottoman armies. They were freeborn Muslims who fulfilled an administrative as well as a military function. In an attempt to maintain a large army without making huge cash payments, the sultans awarded sipahis the rights to the income from agricultural lands known as timars. Each sipahi was assigned a specific timar from which he was allowed to collect the taxes that served as his salary. In return, the sipahi was expected to maintain order in his timar, to report for military service when called upon, and, depending on his income, to bring with him a certain number of armed and mounted retainers. Most of the European and Anatolian provinces were divided into timars, but the practice was uncommon in the Arab territories.

The Civil Service

As a centralized imperial state, the Ottoman Empire was characterized by an immense and elaborate bureaucracy. The Ottomans drew on the administrative traditions of the Byzantines, the Iranians, and the Arabs to create a highly differentiated civil service in which a veritable army of scribes kept detailed records of census surveys, treasury accounts, official appointments, and government rules and regulations. Most of the directors and managers were drawn from the devshirme levy, while the middle-level

Ottoman civil servants were freeborn Muslims who received on-the-job training as apprentices in one of the several ministries. The latter were crucial to the efficient functioning of the state.

The Religious Establishment

Along with the bureaucratic and military elite, the ulama formed the third pillar of the Ottoman ruling class. In keeping with the gazi spirit that inspired the Ottoman rulers and their warriors from the early years of frontier warfare against Byzantium, the sultans accorded the ulama a respected place in society. To a degree unprecedented in the classical Islamic empires, the Ottomans endeavored to establish shari‘ah norms of justice by organizing the qadis (judges) into an official hierarchy and arranging for their appointments in the various administrative subdivisions of the empire. Over time, an official known as the shaykh al-Islam emerged as the chief religious dignitary of the empire; he oversaw the appointment of qadis and madrasah teachers in the far-flung Ottoman territories and acquired status as the official whose legal opinion the sultans sought when they contemplated the introduction of certain administrative and fiscal measures. Despite the influence the ulama exercised on the population at large, despite the importance of the qadis in establishing shari‘ah norms of justice, and despite the authority of the shaykh al-Islam, the entire religious establishment held office at the sultan’s pleasure. The income of the ulama may have been largely independent of the state, but their appointments were not. The shaykh al-Islam who dared to issue an opinion that contradicted the sultan’s wishes was likely to be dismissed, no matter how well founded his opinion in Islamic legal doctrine.

The Millet System

Readers accustomed to the concept of a homogeneous nation-state in which a shared language and a shared sense of citizenship unite the inhabitants may find the Ottomans’ method of organizing their subjects along religious lines unusual. As a result of the Ottoman conquests, the sultans came to rule over lands inhabited by millions of Christians and Jews. The religious mosaic of the Ottoman Empire as a whole can be seen in the population of Istanbul. Of the city's 700,000 inhabitants in the sixteenth century, 58 percent were Muslims, 32 percent Christians, and 10 percent Jews. Partly out of the Islamic requirements of toleration and partly for pragmatic reasons, the sultans organized their non-Muslim subjects into religious communities called millets and granted them considerable autonomy. Each of the three major non-Muslim religions—Greek Orthodox Christianity, Judaism, and Armenian Christianity—was granted millet status and placed under the direct authority of the leading church official. The three officials—the Greek Orthodox patriarch, the Armenian patriarch, and the Jewish grand rabbi—were selected with the approval of the sultan and resided in Istanbul, where the Ottoman state kept track of their activities. Yet recent scholarship has determined that until the nineteenth century, the millet system lacked uniformity, differing from region to region and group to group.

It is nevertheless possible to identify common patterns in Ottoman administration of non-Muslims. Christians and Jews were allowed religious freedom and had the right to retain their religious educational systems and religious legal structures. They were directly administered by their own communal officials, who exercised both civil and religious responsibilities. These officials were in charge of tax collection, education, justice, and religious affairs within their religious communities. By permitting non-Muslim subjects to retain their religious laws, educational systems, and communal leadership, the Ottomans administered their diverse peoples with a minimum of resistance. The Jewish community in particular prospered under Ottoman rule, and large numbers of Jews emigrated from Spain to Ottoman domains following the Christian reconquest. Yet no matter how prosperous or prominent non-Muslims might become, they were not regarded as equal to Muslims. They were tolerated but subject to social discrimination that barred them from service in the Ottoman armed forces and prevented them from becoming members of the Ottoman ruling elite.

THE LOSS OF OTTOMAN SUPERIORITY

Scholars no longer accept the idea that the Ottoman Empire declined precipitously following Süleyman's reign; indeed, some historians now question whether the term decline accurately describes the process through which the Ottoman Empire lost its dominant position. It is perhaps preferable to view the Ottoman experience from the seventeenth to the twentieth centuries as a period of transformation during which the Ottomans struggled to find a new imperial synthesis in a changing international environment. External factors, most prominently the penetration of European merchant capital into the empire, caused a wrenching dislocation of the Ottoman economy. Beginning in the late sixteenth century, Ottoman raw materials, normally channeled into internal consumption and industry, were increasingly exchanged for European manufactured products. This trade benefited Ottoman merchants but led to a decline in state revenues and a shortage of raw materials for domestic consumption. As the costs of scarce materials rose, the empire suffered from inflation, and the state was unable to procure sufficient revenues to meet its expenses. The revenue shortfall dangerously undermined the institutions that supported the Ottoman system, especially the armed forces.

A series of commercial treaties, known as the Capitulations, which the Ottoman sultans signed with the Christian states of Europe, facilitated the penetration of European manufactured goods into the empire and the eventual domination of Ottoman commerce by Europeans and their protégés. The first Capitulation agreement, negotiated with France in 1536, allowed French merchants to trade freely in Ottoman ports, to be exempt from Ottoman taxes, and to import and export goods at low tariff rates. In addition, the treaty granted extraterritorial privileges to French merchants by permitting them to come under the legal jurisdiction of the French consul in Istanbul, thus making them subject to French rather than Ottoman-Islamic law. This first treaty was the model for subsequent agreements signed with other European states.

Negotiated at a time of Ottoman military domination, the Capitulations were intended to encourage commercial exchange. However, when the military balance between Europe and the Ottomans tilted in favor of Europe, European merchants, backed by the power of their states, were able to exploit the Capitulations to Ottoman disadvantage. Beyond devastating the Ottoman economy, the treaties carried long-term political implications.

By granting the various consuls jurisdiction over their nationals within the Ottoman Empire, the Capitulations accorded the consuls extraordinary powers, which they abused with increasing frequency in the nineteenth century.

External economic factors combined with a range of domestic problems to render the components of the Ottoman system less cohesive than they had been in Süleyman's time. The rule of incompetent sultans, the succession struggles, and political discord within the court all served to weaken the central government. The shortage of revenue and the rise of inflation had a disastrous effect on the large numbers of state employees on fixed salaries and bred corruption. Finally, the government's inability to make regular payments to the Janissaries or to fund new military equipment eroded the dominance of the Ottoman armed forces.

This loss of dominance was manifested on the battlefield. In 1683 the Ottomans mounted a second siege of Vienna. Although they were defeated outside the city walls, their ability to launch such an ambitious campaign appeared to demonstrate the power of the Ottoman armed forces. However, in the 1690s, the Ottomans engaged in simultaneous wars with Austria and Russia and were vanquished on both fronts. The Treaty of Karlowitz, signed with Austria in 1699, ceded most of Hungary to the Hapsburgs and marked the Ottomans' first major surrender of European territory. The following year, the sultan signed a treaty with Peter the Great, acknowledging the Russian conquest of the northern shores of the Black Sea. From this point on, the Ottomans were on the defensive. They were not, however, as moribund a military power as they have sometimes been portrayed.

During the eighteenth century, the Ottoman forces held their own in two wars with Austria and defeated the Russian army in two other wars. These victories may have led the Ottoman ruling elite to conclude that the state's armed forces were as relatively powerful as ever. But in the Ottoman-Russian War launched by the Ottomans in 1768, the Russian Baltic fleet destroyed an Ottoman fleet off the coast of Anatolia. The land war was equally devastating for the Ottomans, as the Russian forces drove them out of Romania and the Crimea on the Black Sea. The settlement that ended the war, the Treaty of Küçük Kaynarca (1774), was one of the most humiliating agreements the Ottomans ever signed. In addition to ceding territory, the sultan granted Russia the right to construct a Greek Orthodox church in Istanbul and to make representations to the Ottoman government on behalf of the Greek Orthodox community. These provisions laid the foundation for Russia's claim to be the protector of the entire Greek Orthodox millet within the Ottoman Empire. Russia would use this claim as a pretext for frequent interventions in Ottoman internal affairs in the decades that followed.

The military defeats that led to the ceding of Ottoman territory showed that the armed forces of the empire had lost the technological advantages they once possessed. If the empire was to survive, military improvements had to be undertaken immediately.

THE TRIUMPH OF SHI'ISM: THE SAFAVID EMPIRE OF IRAN, 1501–1736

Shah Isma‘il (1494–1524) and the Establishment of the State

Just as the Ottomans rose from humble origins among the tribes of Anatolia to rule a world empire, so their Safavid rivals to the east emerged from relative obscurity to found a dynamic, prosperous imperial state. The Safavids were of either Kurdish or Turkish origin. In the late thirteenth century, a member of the Safavid family founded a Sunni Sufi religious brotherhood in Azerbaijan, the Turkish-speaking region of northwestern Iran. The brotherhood attracted an ardent following among the Turkish pastoral tribes of the area, and by the late fifteenth century, its influence had expanded into Anatolia and Syria. The heads of the brotherhood led the tribes in expeditions against the Christians of the Caucasus, thereby acquiring temporal power as well as enhancing their reputations as servants of Islam. Their Turkish followers were known as Qizilbash, the Red-headed Ones, after the red headgear they wore to identify themselves as supporters of the Safavid brotherhood.

In 1494 a seven-year-old boy named Isma‘il succeeded his brother as head of the order and eventually transformed it into an imperial institution. Isma‘il’s forces captured the city of Tabriz in 1501 and Isma‘il proclaimed himself shah (king). He then organized a series of campaigns in which the Qizilbash brought areas of eastern Anatolia and Iraq, including Baghdad, under Safavid control. In 1510 Isma‘il extended his authority to eastern Iran, defeating a coalition of Turkish tribesmen and establishing the borders of his state at the Oxus River. Isma‘il’s most committed followers were located among the tribes of Anatolia, but before he could organize them for further expansion against the Ottomans, the sultan sent a huge army into the region. The Ottoman and Safavid forces met at the battle of Chaldiran in 1514; the gunpowder army of the Ottomans crushed the mounted archers of Isma‘il and consolidated Ottoman dominance in eastern Anatolia.

Isma‘il’s defeat at Chaldiran did not prevent him from founding a dynasty and building an empire into which he introduced revolutionary, far-reaching religious changes: He was responsible for establishing Shi‘ism as Iran’s state religion. The Safavid brotherhood was founded as a Sunni order, and historians are uncertain when its leaders adopted Shi‘ism or even if they did so before Isma‘il’s reign. It is known that during Isma‘il’s youth, a local Shi‘a ruler sheltered him, and he may have acquired his Shi‘a convictions then. Whatever the sources for his belief, Isma‘il became a fervent Shi‘a and was determined to make every inhabitant of the territories under his control adopt Shi‘ism. When he proclaimed himself shah in 1501, he also proclaimed Twelver Shi‘ism to be the official and compulsory state religion.

Isma‘il enforced his proclamation by dissolving the Sunni brotherhoods and ordering the executions of all who refused to accept Shi‘ism. As there was no existing Shi‘a religious establishment in Iran, Isma‘il created one by importing Shi‘a ulama and legal experts from the Arab lands, especially from Lebanon. These religious officials filled the vacuum at the highest ranks of the religious hierarchy and laid the groundwork for the emergence of a vibrant Shi‘a ulama class. The version of Twelver Shi‘ism promulgated by Isma‘il contained important deviations from previously accepted doctrine. Isma‘il claimed to be descended from the seventh Imam, to be divinely inspired himself, and to be the earthly representative of the Hidden Twelfth Imam. He thus portrayed himself as guided by the Imam and empowered to render infallible judgments on religious practices and legal issues. Isma‘il’s claims were widely accepted, and the religious authority he claimed for himself was acknowledged to be present in his successors as well.

Under Isma‘il’s successors, Shi‘ism became firmly embedded as the religion of the vast majority of Iranians. Although this outcome did not, as some have claimed, make Shi‘ism synonymous with Iranian national culture, it did set Iran off from its Sunni neighbors. In addition, because the Safavids ruled over a large and powerful empire, their Sunni neighbors, especially the Ottomans, saw their Shi‘a beliefs as a threat. The success of Shi‘ism in the Safavid domains, therefore, created a new level of hostility between Sunni and Shi‘a and made precarious the existence of Shi‘a minority communities within Sunni-administered territories and vice versa.

The military prowess of the Qizilbash tribesmen established the Safavid state. To retain their loyalties, Isma‘il granted tribal leaders control of vast tracts of grazing land and appointed the most powerful of them as provincial governors. This practice did not differ noticeably from the policies followed by the rulers of the dozens of short-lived dynastic principalities that had preceded the Safavids. However, Isma‘il introduced new administrative institutions that enabled the Safavid state to become far more durable than its immediate predecessors. He began to build a governing apparatus by appointing urban Iranians to the newly created bureaucratic posts. Tension developed between the emerging class of Iranian bureaucrats and the Qizilbash tribal leaders, who were largely excluded from the civil administration. At Isma‘il’s death in 1524, the Safavid Empire was in a stage of transition from tribal military regime to absolutist bureaucratic empire.

From the Reign of Shah Abbas I (1587–1629) to the Collapse of the Safavids

A recurring problem for Isma‘il’s successors was the Qizilbash tribesmen’s factiousness and their resistance to state control. Struggles for prominence among the Qizilbash leaders and their occasional revolts against the government prevented them from effectively defending the Safavid domains. When Shah Abbas ascended the throne, Turkish tribal incursions in the east and Ottoman advances in the west threatened to overwhelm his empire. Abbas reversed the decline in Safavid fortunes, and his reign marked the apogee of the Safavid state. He recovered the lost territories on the eastern and western frontiers (including Baghdad), introduced radical domestic reforms, and made his capital, Isfahan, a beautiful, culturally vibrant city.

Recognizing the need to control the unruly Qizilbash leaders, Abbas built up a military counterweight to them in the form of a standing royal army composed of converted Christian slaves captured during expeditions to the Caucasus. This was similar to the Ottoman slave system. The new ghulam (military slave) army was a gunpowder force that included an artillery corps and infantry armed with muskets. This army, which may eventually have numbered 37,000 troops, was directly financed by the shah and was in turn directly responsible to him.

As we will see in succeeding chapters of this book, rulers who sought to improve their armed forces had to find ways of increasing their revenues in order to pay for the expensive new weaponry. In Shah Abbas's case, he transferred lands from the tribal leaders to his own royal estates. Abbas also converted huge areas of Iran into crown lands, the revenues of which went directly to him, not to the state treasury. With these revenues, he financed the new standing army. Abbas's land transfer policy and his direct control of the new military weakened the Qizilbash power base and concentrated centralized royal authority in his person.

In 1598 Shah Abbas designated Isfahan, an established city in central Iran, as the imperial capital. Isfahan was already an established city and had once been the Seljuk capital. However, Abbas transformed the city, lavishing huge sums on the construction of a carefully planned urban center laid out along broad thoroughfares and embellished with richly decorated mosques, a royal palace, luxurious private residences, and a large bazaar. This material splendor, coupled with Abbas's generous patronage, attracted artists and scholars whose presence enriched the city's intellectual and cultural life. Isfahan became the catalyst for an explosion of Persian culture that spread to other Safavid cities and continued after Abbas's death. Isfahan was also a thriving commercial center whose merchants, prospering under the stable, centralized government established by Abbas, became consumers and patrons themselves. At the time of Abbas's death, the Safavid capital had a population estimated at 400,000; its large size and its residents' impressive achievements prompted the inhabitants to coin their famous boast: "Isfahan is half the world."

The centralized machinery of government Abbas had set up enabled the empire to survive his successors' incompetence and provided Iran with another century of political stability. With the exception of a major confrontation with the Ottomans over Iraq, the seventeenth century was a peaceful period in which the economy prospered and cultural life flourished. However, in the absence of external military threats, the Safavid shahs allowed the expensive standing army to decline. The way was opened for a rebellious chieftain to seize Isfahan and bring an end to the Safavid dynasty in 1722.

The Safavids' fall ushered in a lengthy period of decentralization in Iran. From time to time, a powerful military commander was able to establish dominance over the contending tribal confederations and bring large parts of Iranian territory under his control, only to have his fledgling state splinter into factions on his death. Finally, in 1794, a Turkish tribal chieftain named Fath Ali Shah established the Qajar dynasty in central Iran. Although the Qajars were the nominal ruling dynasty of Iran until the 1920s, they never succeeded in recreating the Safavids' royal absolutism or the bureaucratic centralism. The consequences of the diminished authority exercised by the Qajars are discussed in Chapter 6.

CONCLUSION: THE SUNNI-SHI'A STRUGGLE FOR IRAQ

From the time of Shah Isma'il's occupation of Baghdad in 1508 until Sultan Murat IV's reconquest of the city in 1638, the Shi'a Safavids and the Sunni Ottomans waged a seesaw struggle for control of the lands of Iraq. This confrontation had a significant impact on the region at the time as well as created the mixture of sectarian loyalties that has survived into the modern era.

Baghdad and the lands of Iraq were under Safavid control when Isma'il introduced Shi'ism as the compulsory religion for his subjects. Within Iraq, Sunni shrines were destroyed, the main mosques were turned into Shi'a places of worship, and attempts were made to convert the population forcefully. The Ottoman sultans, who considered themselves the protectors of Sunni Islam, could not ignore the imposition of Shi'ism in the territory that had been the center of the Abbasid caliphate. Nor, for economic reasons, could they tolerate Safavid control of the outlet to the Persian Gulf. In 1534 Süleyman the Magnificent commanded an expedition that succeeded in restoring Iraq to Ottoman control and confirming the Ottoman sultan as the supreme ruler in the world of Islam.

Iraq remained in Ottoman hands until 1624, when the armies of Shah Abbas occupied Baghdad and massacred many of its Sunni inhabitants. Again the Ottomans responded, but they were unable to capture the city until 1638. Sultan Murat IV, who led the victorious campaign, immediately sent Ottoman military commanders into the countryside to restore Sunni rites among the population and to banish Shi'a ulama from the region. From that point until World War I, Iraq remained in Ottoman hands.

Although control of the Persian Gulf port of Basra was an important objective for the Ottomans and Safavids alike, the intensity of their struggle for Iraq suggests that something more profound than economic interests was at stake. The lands of Iraq became the center of a contest for supremacy between Ottoman Sunnism and Safavid Shi'ism. The territory evoked different historical images for the followers of the two branches of Islam. To the Ottomans, Baghdad was the Abbasid capital city for 500 years, the home of the founders of universal Islam whose legacy the Ottoman sultans-caliphs sought to perpetuate. For the Safavids, Iraq was the home of the two most sacred shrines in Shi'ism: Najaf, the center of Shi'a theology, and Karbala, the site of the martyrdom of Imam Husayn. The commemoration of Husayn's death was the most important ritual event in Shi'ism, and the Shi'a came to regard pilgrimage to Karbala as a legitimate substitute for the pilgrimage to Mecca. In popular Shi'a practice, a tablet made from the clay of Karbala and said to be impregnated with the blood of Husayn was a valued talisman; put under a pillow, it was believed to guard the sleeper as if he or she were at Karbala, under the protection of Husayn himself.⁴ The Safavid shahs saw the retention of these shrines under Shi'a authority as a religious duty; their loss to the Ottomans was a source of profound grief. It is no wonder that the land of Iraq, sacred to followers of both branches of Islam, became a troubled region. Although it remained Arabic speaking and under Sunni Ottoman control, a majority of its population embraced Shi'ism. The sectarian divisions implanted during the Ottoman-Safavid struggle would play a significant role in Iraq's modern history.

PART TWO

THE BEGINNINGS OF THE ERA OF TRANSFORMATION

For the Ottoman Empire, the eighteenth century marked a period of political and economic disintegration brought about by declining central authority and intense external pressures. The most prominent feature of this decay was a process of decentralization both within the administration and in the Ottoman state's ability to control its territories. As the absolutism of the sultans waned, other officials within the Ottoman system acquired power and the wealth that went with it. These officials came to have a vested interest in the decentralized status quo and opposed the efforts of sultans and grand viziers to reimpose royal absolutism.

The Janissaries, once the dependable military foundation of Ottoman expansionism, became a threat to the state. The discipline of the corps declined, and its members avoided the restrictions that had confined them to military service alone. Janissaries established lucrative business relationships with craft guilds, engaged in trade and commerce themselves, married and brought their offspring into the corps, and developed a reluctance to engage in combat. The Janissaries were determined to protect the privileges decentralization provided them; their rebellions in the streets of Istanbul against any attempts to reform their training or curb their civilian activities became commonplace over the course of the eighteenth century.

The diffusion of power was further evident in the formation of other interest groups within the administration. The bureaucracy, once noted for its efficiency and its adherence to the policy of merit-based promotion, became infused with nepotism, and the buying and selling of offices was a common practice. The high-ranking ulama also exercised considerable independent authority.

The decline of central authority also brought opportunities for local leaders to acquire a greater measure of regional power. Throughout Anatolia and the European and Arab provinces of the empire, local valley lords (derebeys and a'yan) gained increasing degrees of autonomy from Istanbul, setting up what were essentially small principalities. These autonomous rulers did not seek to overthrow the Ottoman state, only to distance themselves from its authority, to collect and control the revenues generated in their territory, and to pass their autonomy on to their heirs. They only provided their allotment of armed men to fight the sultan's wars when they saw some personal advantage in doing so.

The weakness of the central Ottoman state sapped its ability to deal with the military and the economic pressures its European adversaries exerted with increasing frequency. As we saw in Chapter 3, permanent territorial losses became commonplace during the second half of the eighteenth century, sustained due to the Ottoman armed forces' inefficiency. Yet even as the advances of Russia and Austria threatened the state, the entrenched interest groups within the empire refused to surrender their privileges. The Janissaries' intransigence, the derebeys' self-aggrandizement, and the self-serving practices of influential officials and ulama all paralyzed the administration; it was thus incapable of taking the decisive steps required to reverse its fortunes on the battlefield. And with each territorial concession, more revenue-producing land was lost to the Christian enemies.

European gains were not confined to territorial concessions. With the end of the Napoleonic Wars in 1815, European commerce penetrated the Middle East to an unprecedented extent. The products of the Industrial Revolution, cheap textiles and metal goods, flooded the region, changing the pattern of consumption and causing the local handicraft industries to suffer. The incursions of European commerce and capital caused the Middle East's formerly self-sufficient economies to become integrated into the world economic system. In response to the hunger of the European industrializing states for cheap raw materials and foodstuffs, certain regions of the Middle East were transformed into exporters of specialized agricultural products—cotton in Egypt, cereals in Syria, silk in Lebanon. However, commercial agricultural production in the Middle East was dependent on the European market's demands and was thus subject to price fluctuations determined by European needs and tastes. In this way, the Middle East was incorporated into the global economic system as a dependent region, a supplier of raw agricultural commodities, and a consumer of European manufactured goods. The institutional and economic transformation of the Middle East occurred simultaneously: As the rulers of the Ottoman Empire, Egypt, and Iran attempted, with varying degrees of effectiveness and determination, to reform their armed forces and their administrative institutions, their states were drawn into the evolving world economy that was largely shaped by Europe.

Even the benefits of expanded commercial activity in the Ottoman world were realized mainly by European merchants or their local agents. Over the course of the eighteenth century, the Capitulation agreements were renegotiated and additional privileges granted to the European powers. Among them was the right to grant certificates of protection to non-Muslim Ottoman subjects. These certificates, called barats, allowed their holders to receive the same protection European nationals had. Armed with barats, which European representatives freely granted, the minority subjects of the empire had a distinct advantage over Muslim merchants and were able to take control of important sectors of Ottoman external trade. Thus, in commerce as in political organization, the empire experienced a marked tendency toward decentralization.

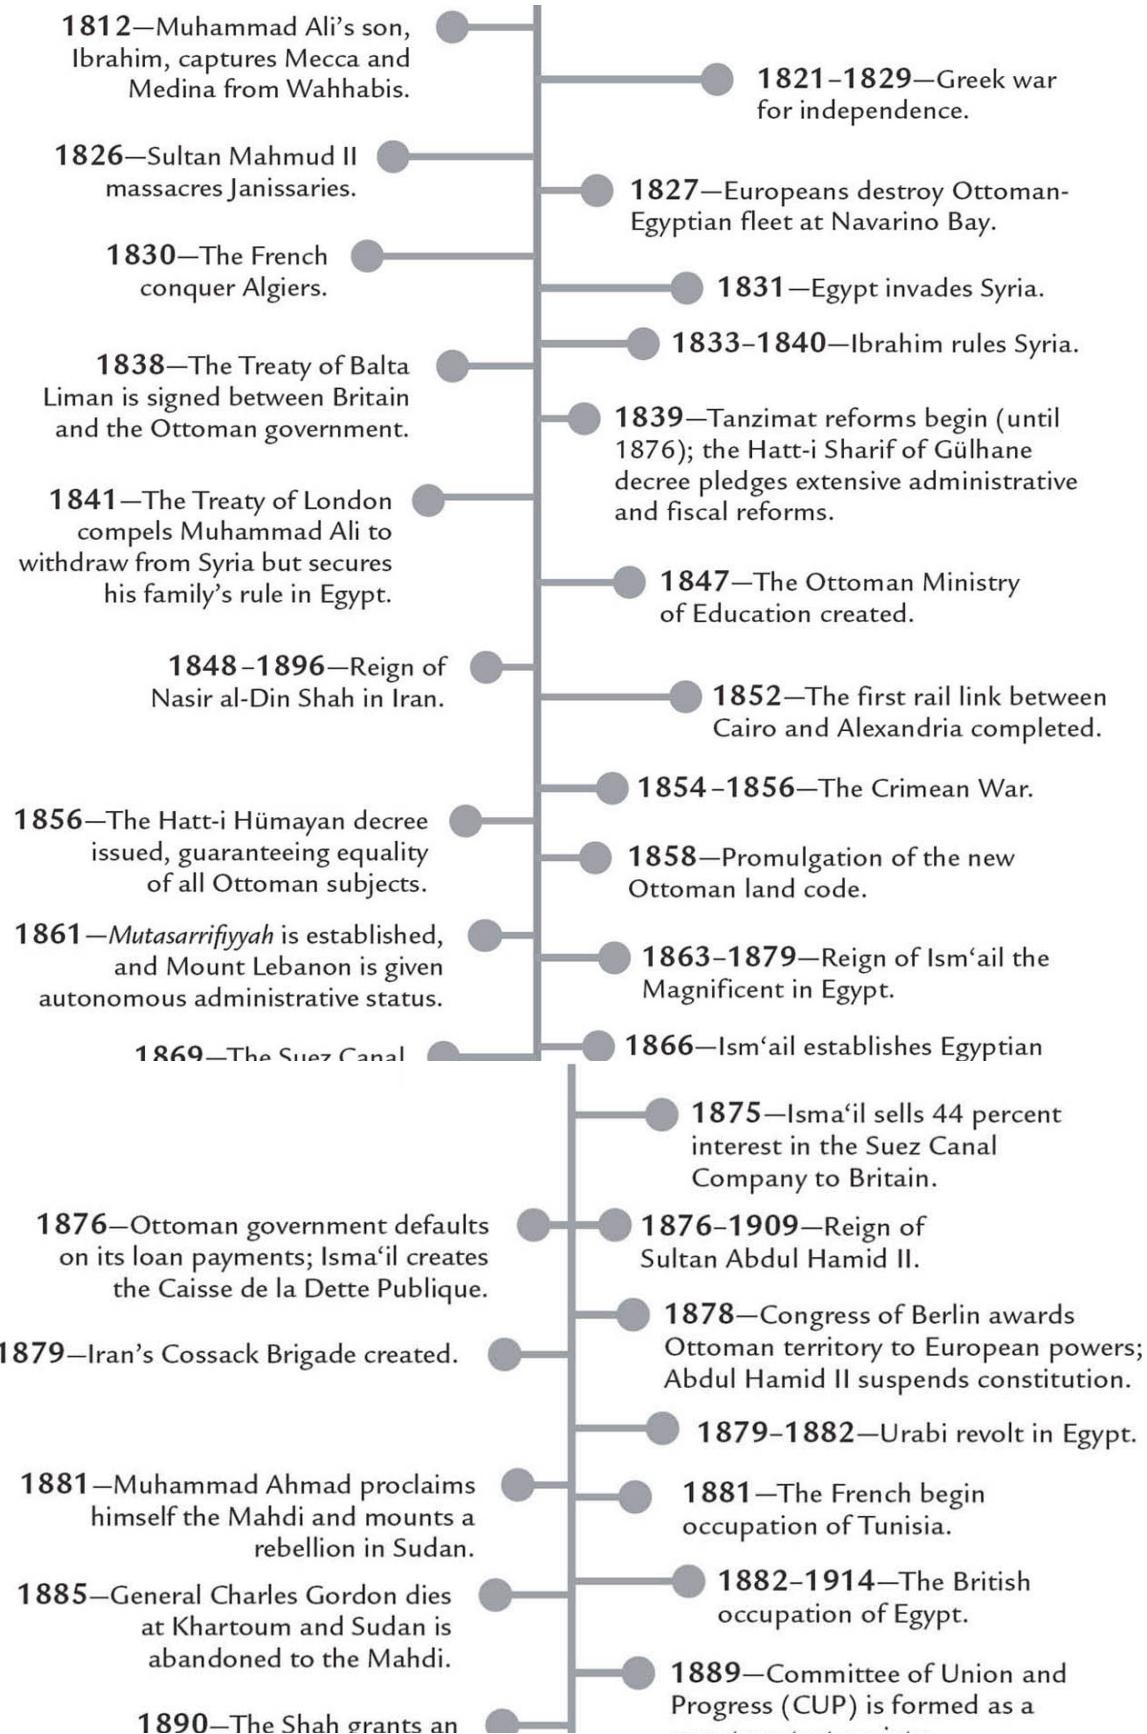

Despite the economic and political difficulties of the eighteenth century, the Ottoman Empire could still draw on considerable human and material resources—its weakness was relative, not absolute. Huge Ottoman armies still took the field; scribes, bureaucrats, and viziers still conducted affairs of state; and the religious establishment nurtured the Islamic traditions and maintained the shari‘ah courts. Each of these components of the Ottoman system may have functioned less efficiently than before, but we should not assume that the empire was on the verge of collapse or that it was completely lacking in officials determined to preserve the Ottoman-Islamic values in the face of European advances.

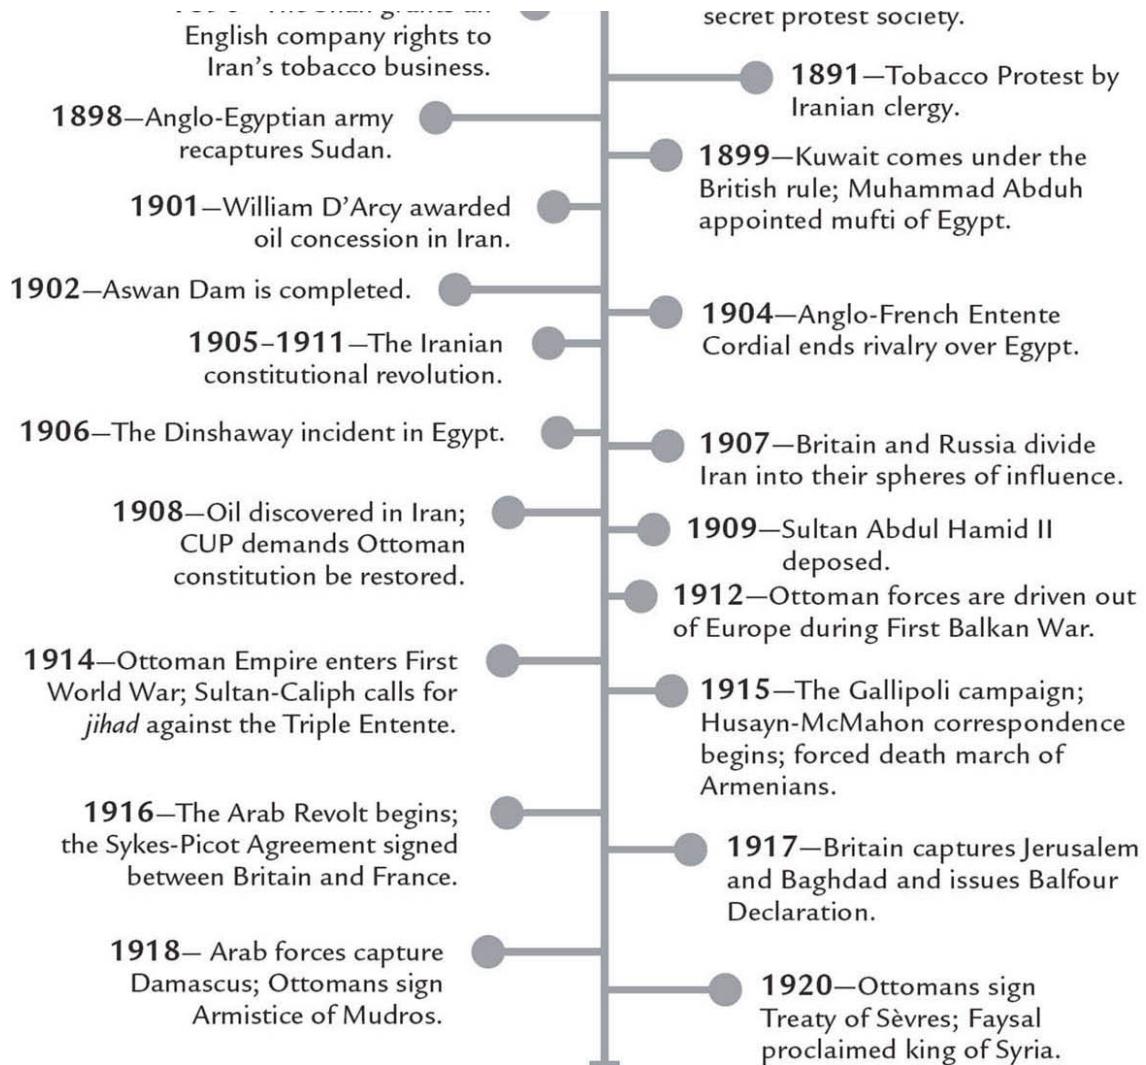

For the Ottoman order to recover, though, the central government had to regain control over the institutions and resources of the state; this was the only way for the state to undertake the military reforms needed for the empire to survive. The failure of Ottoman forces in the field convinced an influential group within the Ottoman ruling class that European military technology was superior. If select elements of that technology could be introduced into the Ottoman armed forces, then perhaps European encroachment could be halted and the Ottoman system would be allowed to revitalize itself without external interference.

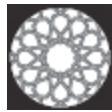

The nineteenth century in the Middle East is frequently characterized as a period of tension between forces of continuity and forces of change. The reformers, who advocated the adoption of European institutions and technology, have often been portrayed as the progressive elements of society courageously charting the course toward an inevitably Westernized twentieth century. Conversely, the adherents of continuity, who viewed with alarm the dismantling of the Islamic order and sought to preserve tradition and retain the values and ideals that had served Ottoman and Islamic society so well for so long, are sometimes portrayed as nothing but archaic reactionaries. But we should avoid these simplistic characterizations if we are to appreciate the agonizing and dangerous process of transforming an established religious, social, and political worldview.

KEY EVENTS: THE BEGINNINGS OF THE ERA OF TRANSFORMATION

CHAPTER 4

FORGING A NEW SYNTHESIS

The Pattern of Reforms, 1789–1849

The sixty-year period from the ascent of the Ottoman sultan Selim III to the death of the Egyptian governor Muhammad Ali defines an era of state-sponsored military reforms during which the rulers of the Ottoman Empire and Egypt sought to remake their armed forces in the European image. The military reformers of this era did not question the cultural norms, social structures, or political relationships on which the Ottoman order rested; however, their efforts to transform their armed forces and reestablish central political authority led them to reorganize the government machinery and introduce new educational facilities. Military reform was thus the spearhead for the reform of civilian institutions and the creation of a new elite whose status was based on its training in European-style academies. Taken together, these government-sponsored activities inserted the central state into the daily lives of its subjects more directly and more pervasively than before. Whether it was Muhammad Ali, the autonomous governor of Egypt, or the reforming Sultan Mahmud II in the central Ottoman Empire, the rulers in the era of transformation sought to expand the central state and to eliminate the customary intermediaries—the ulama or the millet leaders, for example—between the population and the state. In the course of pursuing their goals, the rulers of this period confronted—and in many cases destroyed—elements of the old order that opposed them. By so doing, they unintentionally undermined the Ottoman system as a whole and opened the doors to changes that extended far beyond the military.

SELIM III (1789–1806): BETWEEN OLD AND NEW

The policies of Sultan Selim III intensified his eighteenth-century predecessors' efforts at military reform. His goal was not to transform the traditional Ottoman state but to preserve and strengthen it. In this regard, he was a conservative ruler whose vision of the proper Ottoman order was modeled on the system established under Süleyman the Magnificent. But because Selim's programs laid the groundwork for a full-fledged reform movement by his successor and because his downfall identified the barriers to further change, his reign constituted an important bridge between old and new.¹

When Selim ascended the Ottoman throne, the empire was engaged in yet another losing war with Austria and Russia. To the sultan and his trusted advisers, the lessons of the campaign were clear: Without military improvements, the Ottoman state could not survive. Once peace was concluded in 1792, Selim embarked on a series of reforms designed to reorganize the armed forces along European lines. He employed European advisers, under whose supervision new methods of training and tactics were introduced, new weapons were purchased and deployed, and existing foundries and arsenals were upgraded and new ones constructed. In an effort to placate the Janissaries and to convince them to accept the new methods, Selim raised their salaries and rebuilt their barracks. However, he only aroused their suspicions, and they resisted his moves toward reform. Frustrated in his attempts to curb their domestic unrest or to improve their military prowess, Selim took steps to bypass them.

To this end, the sultan's most ambitious military project was the creation of a new infantry corps trained and equipped according to the latest European standards. This unit, the nizam-i jedid (the new order), was formed in 1797 and adopted a pattern of recruitment that was uncommon for the imperial forces. It was composed of Turkish peasant youths from Anatolia, a clear indication that the devshirme system was no longer functional. Officered and trained by Europeans, the nizam-i jedid was outfitted with modern weapons and French-style uniforms. By 1806 the new army numbered around 23,000 troops, including a modern artillery corps, and its units performed effectively in minor actions. But Selim III's inability to integrate the force with the regular army and his reluctance to deploy it against his domestic opponents limited its role in defending the state it was created to preserve.

Opening to the West

Although Selim wished to restrict the adoption of European technology and ideas to the military, his decision to establish permanent Ottoman embassies in the European capitals opened new channels for the transmission of knowledge about the West into educated Ottoman circles. The first mission was sent to London in 1793, and by the end of the century, Ottoman embassies had also been set up in Paris, Berlin, and Vienna. The recognition that it was necessary to have permanent representation in Europe marked a departure from previous Ottoman practice. From the beginning of the Ottoman conquests, European commercial and diplomatic agents had been active in Ottoman domains. But the Ottomans, convinced of their system's superiority, had not deemed it necessary to round out an exchange. If the European rulers needed commercial agreements or peace treaties, they had to send their representatives to Istanbul to seek the sultan's favor there. When an Ottoman ruler wished to discover information about conditions in Europe, he relied on reports from the European representatives. In the centuries of Ottoman domination, the drawbacks of this one-sided dialogue may have been minimal; by Selim's time, however, they were of major significance.

A similar attitude of superiority prevailed toward the languages of Europe; an educated Muslim Ottoman official of Selim III's era might have known Ottoman, Arabic, and Persian, but he would not have had the opportunity to study a single European language. The Ottoman state communicated with Europe through official court translators (dragomans) employed from the Christian millets. By the eighteenth century, members of the Istanbul Greek community held most of the top dragoman positions in the imperial service.

During Selim's reign, the impact of the new embassies on informing the court about conditions in Europe was slight. The Ottoman ambassadors were ignorant of the languages of their assigned countries and relied on the goodwill of the Greek dragomans they took with them. Nevertheless, these missions provided a small cadre of young Ottoman officials with direct experience of Europe and a grounding in French, the language of European diplomacy.

The Overthrow of Selim III

The formation and expansion of the nizam-i jedid aroused active opposition from the elements of Ottoman society that had benefited from the decline of central authority. From the start of Selim's reign, the Janissaries had viewed his entire program of military reform as a threat to their independence, and they refused to serve alongside the new army in the field. The powerful derebeys were alarmed that the sultan financed his new forces by confiscating timars and directing the revenue toward the nizam-i jedid. Further opposition came from the ulama and other members of the ruling elite who objected to the European-style military reforms.

Led by the rebellious Janissaries, these forces came together in 1806, deposed Selim III, and selected a successor, Mustafa IV, who pledged not to interfere with their privileges. The decree of deposition accused Selim III of failing to respect Islam and the Ottoman tradition. Over the next year, the embassies in Europe were dismantled, the nizam-i jedid troops were dispersed, and the deposed sultan, whose cautious military reforms had aimed to do no more than preserve the Ottoman tradition, was murdered.

A REVIVED CENTER OF POWER: THE EGYPT OF MUHAMMAD ALI, 1805–1848

The Mamluk Restoration and the French Invasion

The diversion of Ottoman resources in wars with European states and campaigns against local warlords reduced the empire's ability to maintain administrative control over several of its provinces. This was evident in the case of Egypt, which by the late eighteenth century had become in reality if not in name an autonomous state under a revived Mamluk order. Although the Ottomans continued to send governors to Cairo, the Mamluk *bey*s (senior officials) had effectively replaced the sultan's representatives as the source of administrative and financial authority in the province. The Mamluk regime was unstable, oppressive, and unpopular. It had no cohesive central government but operated instead through a network of competing Mamluk households, each of which collected taxes, employed troops, and engaged in commercial ventures with local merchants and European agents. Lacking an administrative center to provide direction, society was held together by arrangements worked out among the Mamluks and leading merchants, guildspeople, and religious officials. But from time to time, one of the Mamluks attracted sufficient clients and men-at-arms to become dominant in the country. One such figure was Ali Bey al-Kabir (1760–1773), who expanded Egypt's trade with Britain and France and showed a willingness to improve his army by hiring European advisers and purchasing European weapons. However, Ali Bey was overthrown by his own Mamluk military commander, and from 1775 to 1798, a tenuous alliance between two rival Mamluk factions dominated Egypt.

Thus, although late-eighteenth-century Egypt was not as isolated as it has sometimes been portrayed, the frequent internecine warfare among the Mamluk factions and their heavy-handed tax policies broke down order and security in the rural areas. Moreover, the Mamluk system's tendency to fragment prevented the establishment of any stable central authority through which resources could be organized and administration regularized. These conditions would change during the governorship of Muhammad Ali.

Following the French Revolution in 1789, Britain and France became embroiled in a series of wars that lasted until French emperor Napoleon Bonaparte's defeat at Waterloo in 1815. The major battles of the Napoleonic Wars were fought on the European continent, but the Franco-British rivalry extended beyond Europe and brought the two powers into conflict over access to overseas markets and strategic outposts. Egypt became enmeshed in this rivalry when an ambitious French expedition led by Napoleon invaded the country in 1798 and decisively defeated Mamluk forces at the Battle of the Pyramids. The immediate French military objective was to strike at Britain's communications routes with India. Napoleon was also motivated by commercial considerations, hoping to colonize Egypt and to establish it as a reliable source of grain for the French mainland. The British destruction of the French fleet in 1798 at the battle of Aboukir Bay near Alexandria frustrated French goals, and Napoleon returned to France.

The rest of the expeditionary force, cut off from the outside by the British fleet, remained in troubled occupation of the country for three years. The engineers and scientists whom Napoleon had brought with him drew up plans for new canals and communications, and the fledgling French administration attempted to reorganize the landholding and taxation systems. But the occupation was unpopular among Egyptians, and few of the French schemes were implemented. The episode was brought to an end by a joint British-Ottoman expedition that landed in Egypt in 1801 and eventually arranged for the evacuation of the French forces. One key result of the French invasion was to impress on local Middle Eastern rulers the technological capabilities of a European power that could mount a complex amphibious expedition across the Mediterranean and penetrate to the very heartlands of Ottoman.

The Reform Policies of Muhammad Ali

From one perspective, Muhammad Ali can be viewed as another traditional warlord seeking to establish an independent hereditary dynasty at the expense of the weakened Ottoman state. Yet for all the customary features of warlordism and absolutism that characterized Muhammad Ali's rule in Egypt, his regime also represented the first sustained program in the Middle East of state-sponsored Europeanization of the military and of the institutions that supported it.

Muhammad Ali was an ethnic Albanian, born and raised in the Greek coastal city of Kavalla. He arrived in Egypt in 1801 as second in command of an Albanian contingent that was part of the Ottoman expedition sent to evacuate the French. Several factions competed to fill the power vacuum left by the French departure. Muhammad Ali emerged the victor, and in 1805, Istanbul recognized him as the Ottoman governor of Egypt. With his position established, Muhammad Ali launched Egypt on a breathtaking forty years of internal development and imperial expansion. He completely refashioned the armed forces, reorganized the administration and installed a centralized bureaucracy, changed the patterns of landholding and agricultural production, introduced heavy industry, and conquered an empire that, by the 1830s, included the northern Sudan, the western coast of Arabia, all of Greater Syria, and parts of southwestern Anatolia. These changes formed part of the state-building process in which Muhammad Ali transformed Egypt's governing structures from those of a subordinate province to those of a fledgling state. In the course of making Egypt a military and economic power, Muhammad Ali also brought the country into sustained diplomatic and commercial contact with Western Europe.

Muhammad Ali's political objective was to secure independence from the Ottoman Empire and to establish in Egypt a hereditary dynasty for his family. Because he believed independence could be won and preserved only by means of a powerful army and navy, the main purpose of all of his reforms was to strengthen the armed forces. Impressed by what he had seen of British and French troops, he determined to model his military along European lines. The immediate barrier to Muhammad Ali's goal of building a European-style army was the Mamluks' continued interference. Unable to reform them or to win their allegiance, Muhammad Ali, in 1811, ordered the massacre of about seventy-four leading Mamluks as they left a banquet. The ensuing months saw Mamluk power decisively broken throughout the country, and Muhammad Ali began reconstructing an officer corps based on the European model.

In particular, he established an officers' training school in Aswan with European instructors and Turkish and Mamluk students. In a further attempt to produce a cadre of Egyptians with an understanding of European military sciences, he sent several training missions to Europe, mainly to France. Members of these groups, returning to Egypt with firsthand experience of Europe and knowledge of its languages, had an impact on the future direction of their country that extended far beyond the narrowly military origins of their training. In addition to providing for the specific training of combat officers, Muhammad Ali founded educational institutions intended to produce experts in military support services. During a twenty-year period beginning in the early 1820s, schools of medicine, veterinary medicine, engineering, and chemistry opened their doors. These too would have influence beyond their initial military intent.

This intensive program of higher education oriented toward Western subject matter brought with it a concurrent effort to produce suitable textbooks and instruction manuals. In 1835, Muhammad Ali established the School of Languages for the purpose of training translators and preparing Arabic textbooks for the state educational institutions. Until its closure in the 1850s, this school powerfully influenced Egypt's cultural and educational life. A related development was the founding of a government printing press that published the translated materials and printed government decrees and, in 1828, brought out the first Arabic-language newspaper, al-Waqai al-Misriyyah (Official Gazette). Muhammad Ali's wholehearted acceptance of the printing press was of the utmost importance in promoting the spread of Western ideas to Egypt's educated elite.

In setting up his European-style facilities for training officers, Muhammad Ali needed to obtain large numbers of common soldiers to fill his new army. At one point, he thought the inhabitants of the Sudan could be molded into an effective slave army, and in 1820, he ordered an invasion of the region. Although a portion of northern Sudan was successfully conquered and added to Egypt's domains, an army of Sudanese troops did not materialize. Muhammad Ali then turned to Egypt itself and began conscripting native Egyptian fellahin (peasants). Like Selim III's use of Anatolian Turks in the nizam-i jedid, this was a departure from the existing Ottoman norm. But Muhammad Ali was not bound by traditional notions of warfare, and though his relentless conscription led to the depopulation of the countryside, he managed to build a peasant army that, at its peak, numbered more than 130,000 troops. Conscription represented a new form of government control over the population. Effective conscription—as well as efficient taxation—required accurate population statistics, and Muhammad Ali endeavored to collect them by establishing conscription registers and, later, by ordering a national census. Military service was harsh and conscription was dreaded, but Muhammad Ali was determined to support his bid for independence with a credible military machine.

Muhammad Ali recognized that to pay for his military, he would have to exploit Egypt's resources to their limits and ensure the maximum possible revenues from all productive sources. At the time Muhammad Ali became governor of Egypt, the existing systems of land tenure and taxation allowed considerable revenue to be diverted from the state. Mamluks and individuals within the ulama profited from their control of iltizam, a tax-farming system in which tax farmers remitted a fixed annual sum to the treasury and retained whatever surplus they could extort from the peasants under their control.

During the first ten years of his rule, Muhammad Ali confiscated the iltizam lands and instituted a tax on the extensive waqf revenues administered by the ulama. Waqf was a practice, approved by the shari‘ah, that permitted the income from property to be set aside in perpetuity for charitable purposes such as the upkeep of mosques and schools. The revenue from waqf endowments was not subject to tax, and by the nineteenth century, large portions of productive land in both Egypt and the central Ottoman domains were devoted to waqf and thus lay outside state control. The ulama acted as trustees for waqf endowments and assigned waqf revenues to their designated purposes. The centralizing governments of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries sought to break the hold of the ulama over waqfs and to gain control of the revenues generated by the endowments. Thus Muhammad Ali's policies served the dual purpose of increasing the state's control over land and revenue and of reducing the wealth and prestige of the Mamluks and the ulama. Over the course of his reign, Muhammad Ali granted land to certain trusted officials who were expected to cultivate it in exchange for tax exemptions, and he gave large tracts of land to his relatives. The net result was to concentrate enormous holdings into the hands of a few families.

Muhammad Ali's regime also experimented with new crops, by far the most important of which was a special variety of long-staple cotton known as Jumel, after the French engineer who helped develop it. The European textile industry favored Jumel cotton, and it quickly became Egypt's most lucrative cash crop. To boost revenues further, Muhammad Ali brought previously marginal lands into cultivation and increased the yields of existing plots by rebuilding and expanding the irrigation system. Thousands of fellahin were put to work dredging canals and constructing barrages so the annual Nile flood could be stored and used for a full summer growing season when the river was low. These public works projects were carried out through extensive use of the corvée, a levy of forced peasant labor. As with the regime's large-scale conscription practices, the corvée, by uprooting peasants from their lands and forcing them to serve on work gangs, caused a temporary decline in agricultural productivity in those regions most heavily affected by the levy. It was common for foremen on the work gangs to apply the khurbaj (whip). Muhammad Ali did not introduce the corvée and the khurbaj into the Egyptian countryside, but he did not prohibit their use.

Early in Muhammad Ali's rule, Egypt's revenues came mainly from agricultural exports. However, Muhammad Ali did not intend for Egypt to become an exporter of raw materials and an importer of European manufactured products. In an effort to make the country self-sufficient, he began a program of industrialization with an emphasis on war-related materials and textiles for the local market. By the mid-1820s, the arsenal in the Cairo citadel was producing 1,600 muskets a month, and in the late 1830s, the new naval complex at Alexandria employed 4,000 workers and was responsible for the construction of nine warships with over 100 guns each.² Machinery and managers were imported from Europe, but the labor force was recruited from among Egyptian peasants and craftsmen. Estimates on the numbers of workers vary widely, but it appears that during the late 1830s, at least 30,000 to 40,000 Egyptians were employed in industrial enterprises. The products of the war-related industries were of high quality, whereas the textile industry was less successful and could not capture markets that Muhammad Ali did not control directly. The entire program of state-sponsored industrialization was rushed, and many of the factories were abandoned in the 1840s when Muhammad Ali was forced to reduce the size of his army to 18,000 men (see the next section).

Muhammad Ali's ability to direct the Egyptian economy and to control its revenues was attained through a monopoly system. He forced cultivators to sell directly to him at a fixed price and then sold to European buyers at the considerably higher market price. He controlled industrial development in a similar fashion, directing capital investment and collecting the revenues. His domestic monopoly rankled European merchants, who had no opportunity to purchase materials from any Egyptian supplier other than the governor. For most of his reign, Muhammad Ali appears to have defied many of the Capitulation restrictions that were supposed to apply in all Ottoman territories.

One of Muhammad Ali's lasting achievements—and the one that made the implementation of his other reformist schemes possible—was the reorganization of the central administration. Government was taken away from competing Mamluk factions and centralized under Muhammad Ali's absolute authority. From him came a system of delegated power that at the highest level rested in functionally differentiated ministries. At the middle level there emerged a new group of officials trained in technical and administrative schools and appointed on the basis of their qualifications. Government became more bureaucratized and more predictable. To buttress the state's control over the countryside, Egypt was divided into ten provinces, each administered by a centrally appointed governor responsible for law and order and tax collection.

The complexities of Muhammad Ali's government should not be overemphasized. He ran his state in the manner of an extended household; his sons were appointed to key positions, his loyal officials received land grants, and he made the major decisions himself. Nor should Muhammad Ali's success in Egypt be associated with any identification on his part with Egyptians. He was a dynast, not an Egyptian, and he reputedly despised his subjects. The language of his higher administration was Ottoman Turkish, not the local Arabic, and the initial composition of his new bureaucratic and military elite showed his preference for Turks and Circassians over native Egyptians. He also exhibited the traditional Ottoman reliance on minority groups for administrative expertise; his administration contained a high proportion of local Christians, and his most trusted personal adviser and minister of foreign affairs, Boghos Pasha, was an Armenian. Although Muhammad Ali continued to regard himself as a member of an Ottoman ruling elite that was culturally and linguistically separated from the population over which it ruled, his pragmatic educational policies turned out a new elite of native Egyptians who assumed positions of responsibility in the bureaucracy. The high posts in the military hierarchy continued to be awarded to non-Egyptians, but within the civilian administration, the graduates of the new schools began to secure important positions. Within a generation of Muhammad Ali's passing, Arabic replaced Ottoman Turkish as the language of administration.

The Wars of Expansion

Unlike Selim III, who did not have the opportunity to deploy his new army, Muhammad Ali sent his reformed military on wars throughout the Middle East. His military campaigns began in the service of the Ottoman sultan; they concluded with the near conquest of Istanbul.

His first overseas campaign was against the puritanical Wahhabi movement in western Arabia (see Chapter 7). The Wahhabis had captured the holy cities of Mecca and Medina, and the Ottoman sultan, Mahmud II, diverted by European war and domestic turmoil, ordered Muhammad Ali to put down the revolt. The Egyptian forces, led by Muhammad Ali's son Ibrahim, a brilliant commander, landed in Arabia in 1811 and, over the course of a difficult campaign, captured Mecca and Medina and established an Egyptian presence in the Hijaz. The conquest of the Sudan began in 1820 and brought portions of that region, including its Red Sea coast, under Egyptian dominion (see Map 4.1).

Meanwhile, events in Ottoman Europe gave Muhammad Ali an opportunity to expand his empire's Mediterranean base. In 1821, a nationalist revolt against Ottoman rule broke out in Greece. The insurrection dragged on until Sultan Mahmud II requested Muhammad Ali's military intervention. In exchange for his assistance, Muhammad Ali was promised the governorship of Crete. The Egyptian forces, commanded by Ibrahim, subdued the Greek rebels and helped the Ottomans recapture Athens in 1827. By this time, however, the Greek revolt had become internationalized, and European intervention forced Ibrahim to evacuate his troops and leave Crete under Ottoman sovereignty. Muhammad Ali's support of the sultan had proved costly and had gained him no new territory. His next campaigns would serve his own needs.

To obtain raw materials lacking in Egypt (especially timber for his navy) and a captive market for Egypt's new industrial output, Muhammad Ali turned against the sultan and invaded Syria. From fall 1831 to December 1832, Ibrahim led the Egyptian army through Lebanon and Syria and across the Taurus Mountains into Anatolia, where he defeated the Ottoman forces and pushed on to Kuhtaya, only 150 miles from Istanbul.

1833, the two states signed a defensive alliance, the Treaty of Unkiar Skelessi. This treaty overturned a cornerstone of British policy: the aim to keep Russian influence at Istanbul to a minimum. Thus, when the treaty was disclosed, British and French diplomats swung into action to prevent further Russian gains in Istanbul. They pressured the sultan and Muhammad Ali to end their hostilities and sign a treaty recognizing Ibrahim as governor of the Anatolian district of Adana and all of Greater Syria. Although Muhammad Ali had failed to achieve international recognition of his sovereign independence, he had expanded his empire and survived the European intervention his actions had caused. He would not be so fortunate the next time.

While governor of Syria (1833–1840), Ibrahim introduced many domestic programs that had already been adopted in Egypt. As the Egyptian monopoly system was also imposed on Syria, it became a captive market for Egyptian textiles. The resulting damage to the local craft industries, in combination with Ibrahim's imposition of military conscription, sparked unrest in the region during the late 1830s. Hoping to use this popular ferment to his advantage, Sultan Mahmud II sent an army against Ibrahim in spring 1839. But the resulting rout of the Ottoman forces at the battle of Nezib set off yet another international diplomatic crisis, one that brought an end to Muhammad Ali's imperial dreams. Convinced that Muhammad Ali's rising military and commercial power was incompatible with British interests in the Middle East, Britain sent a fleet to Beirut in 1840 and, in joint action with Ottoman forces, landed troops in Lebanon. Once the expedition was ashore, the seething local hostility against Ibrahim's administration burst forth in a number of popular uprisings. Ibrahim retreated to Egypt, and the powers of Europe imposed a settlement on the Ottoman-Egyptian conflict.

The Treaty of London of 1841 compelled Muhammad Ali to withdraw from all the territories he had occupied except the Sudan. The treaty also limited the Egyptian army's size to 18,000 men. Although these were significant restrictions with important consequences for Egypt, Muhammad Ali managed to achieve at least a portion of his objectives. The treaty stated that Egypt's governorship was to be a hereditary office held by his family, and indeed Muhammad Ali's descendants would rule Egypt until 1952.

However, the Egypt of his successors would find itself in a considerably weaker economic position. Partly as a result of Muhammad Ali's occupation of Syria and his establishment of the monopoly system there, Great Britain persuaded the Ottoman government to sign a trade convention in 1838 known as the Treaty of Balta Liman. The agreement would profoundly impact Ottoman (including Egyptian) economic development. It provided for the abolition of all monopolies within the Ottoman Empire and granted foreign goods entry at the favorable tariff rate of 3 percent. Other European states wrested similar concessions from the Ottomans. In combination with a vigorous enforcement of the Capitulations by the European powers and a decline in Egypt's military strength, the Balta Liman agreement helped end Egypt's industrial development and economic independence. Thus, a significant result of Muhammad Ali's reign was to intensify Western European involvement in the affairs of the Middle East as a whole and Egypt in particular. To paraphrase Marshall Hodgson on Europe's determination and ability to defend its developing global interests, if Egypt mattered in London, then London would surely matter in Egypt.

Following the signing of the Treaty of London and the forced reduction of the Egyptian armed forces, most of Muhammad Ali's war-related industries were abandoned, many of his schools were closed, and public works projects ceased. The military machine for whose needs he had developed the Egyptian economy no longer existed. Yet despite Muhammad Ali's failure to establish complete Egyptian independence, he had constructed a government infrastructure that outlasted his rule. To his successors he left two vital legacies: a centralized administration and a small cadre of trained officials who would continue his commitment to European-inspired reform.

NATIONALISM AND GREAT POWER INTERVENTION: THE GREEK REVOLT, 1821–1829

In addition to outside powers and internal warlords, the Ottoman government faced another threat to its territorial integrity during the nineteenth century: nationalist independence movements by its European subjects. The new ideology of nationalism, with its central principle that peoples speaking the same language and holding shared memories of a common past should form distinct political states, endangered the imperial religious structure on which the Ottoman Empire rested. As nationalism spread among its Balkan subjects, the state encountered a continuous series of nationalist uprisings that the Great Powers often manipulated for their own ends. The first Balkan independence revolt broke out in Serbia in 1804. But because of the Serbs' difficulties in attracting a Great Power patron, the uprising did not achieve its objectives until 1830, when Serbia was granted autonomy. The Greek revolt, in contrast, generated Great Power support and led to the creation of an independent Greek state.

Two components distinguished the Ottoman Greek world in the early nineteenth century. The first lay outside Greece proper and comprised the cosmopolitan Greek intellectual and commercial centers in Istanbul and the Russian Black Sea port of Odessa. Members of the flourishing community in Odessa were prominent in shipping and trade, whereas the Phanariot (from their quarter, Phanar) Greeks in Istanbul dominated the hierarchy of the Greek Orthodox church and held the influential positions of dragomans. Members of this wider Greek community became familiar with conditions in Western Europe and the ideology of the French Revolution, which they communicated to their compatriots in Greece. In 1814, a secret society, Philike Hetairia (the Society of Friends), was founded in Odessa for the purpose of coordinating a movement for the independence of Greece from the Ottomans.

Conditions on the Greek mainland contrasted starkly with the world of Phanar and Odessa. As in other regions of the empire, the decline of Ottoman central authority in Greece caused government to become less efficient and more capricious and led to the rise of local Turkish—and Greek—derebeys who controlled the land and exploited the peasantry. Fueling popular alienation from the Ottoman overlords was the development of nationalism, in this case stimulated by a resurgence of Greek literature and a new awareness of the classical Greek past. The Ottomans came to be seen as alien oppressors, not imperial protectors.

Armed revolt broke out in 1821 and briefly occupied two fronts. The Philike Hetairia, led by Alexander Ypsilantis, attempted to foment a rebellion in the Danubian Principalities; the Ottoman forces quickly crushed this ill-conceived endeavor. On the Greek mainland, rebel bands attacked Ottoman installations and killed individual Turkish residents. Though lacking coordination and central leadership, the mainland uprising successfully drove the Ottomans from the Peloponnesus. However, the rebels could not force the Ottomans out of the north, and the Ottomans could not subdue the Greek forces in the Peloponnesus. In what was a brutal confrontation, both sides took bitter reprisals against civilians. The enmity spread to Istanbul, where the Ottomans executed the patriarch of the Greek Orthodox church and the chief dragoman. These killings marked a significant break in the relationship between the Ottoman ruling elite and the Greek elite of Istanbul's Phanar quarter, on whom the Ottomans had relied as translators and transmitters of information about Western Europe. Consequently, the Ottomans had to train their own Muslim translators in Western languages.

Desperate to end the rebellion, Sultan Mahmud II called on Muhammad Ali of Egypt, whose troops, as we have seen, had considerable success against the rebels. When the Egyptian and Ottoman forces linked up in 1827, the revolt appeared doomed. At this point the Great Powers asserted their interests—and changed the outcome of events. In Britain, public opinion ran overwhelmingly in favor of the Greek cause. Russia, using its standard pretext for interference in Ottoman affairs, emphasized its role as protector of the Greek Orthodox church and asserted its right to intervene on behalf of its coreligionists.

Here was displayed the delicate pattern of diplomacy that developed around what came to be called the Eastern Question. Britain and Russia each feared that the other would use the excuse of the Greek revolt to acquire Ottoman territory. Both powers were eager to gain an advantage at the Ottomans' expense, but they did not wish to antagonize each other and ignite a war between themselves. They therefore applied the unwritten code of Eastern Question diplomacy: They joined together, along with France, and offered to mediate between the Ottomans and the Greeks, hoping that by overseeing the settlement of the crisis, they would preserve their respective interests. But Mahmud II refused to play according to the rules of European diplomacy. He insisted that the only acceptable settlement was the full restoration of Ottoman sovereignty over Greece. The Great Power alliance responded to the sultan's intransigence by escalating its pressure and sending a fleet to Greece in 1827 to blockade supplies bound for the Ottoman-Egyptian forces. Somehow, the European and Ottoman-Egyptian fleets both chose Navarino Bay for their anchorage. Without a declaration of war from either side, one of the largest naval battles of the nineteenth century occurred on October 20, 1827. When it was over, most of the Ottoman-Egyptian fleet lay at the bottom of the bay.

The Navarino defeat prompted Muhammad Ali to withdraw from Greece, but Sultan Mahmud II refused to concede the loss of the region. Russia then declared war on the Ottoman Empire in 1828, and by the following year, its armies had crossed the Danube and captured Adrianople, the Ottomans' second capital. The checks and balances of Eastern Question diplomacy were supposed to prevent such a situation—specifically, that with the empire facing a disastrous military defeat, one power, Russia, stood to make substantial unilateral territorial gains. In response, Britain considered dispatching a fleet to Istanbul, and war seemed imminent. However, Britain and Russia avoided hostilities when they concluded that dismembering the Ottoman Empire was not in either of their best interests. The empire's existence as a weak buffer state between their competing ambitions was preferable to going to war over the division of Ottoman territories.

The Greek crisis was settled according to this principle. In the Treaty of Adrianople (1829) between the Ottomans and Russians, Russia reduced its original territorial demands and agreed to withdraw to the Danube. The affairs of Greece were regulated by a convention of 1832, which declared Greece an independent state under the protection of Britain, Russia, and France. The Greece that emerged from the revolt was a truncated state of some 800,000 inhabitants, with 2.4 million Greeks remaining under Ottoman rule. This was a virtual guarantee that Greek foreign policy would be irredentist, intent on acquiring more of the territory they considered theirs.

Joint Ottoman-Egyptian action had defeated the forces of the Greek revolt, but Great Power intervention overturned the results achieved in the local arena. Subsequent Balkan nationalist revolts did not produce exactly the same sequence of Great Power involvement, but all attracted external intervention, forcing the Ottomans always to pay attention not just to the rebels but also to the rebels' potential Great Power patrons. That the Ottomans could also find outside patrons and manipulate Great Power rivalries to their own advantage was a lesson Mahmud II learned well when he used the Russian threat to help create the Franco-British alliance that halted Muhammad Ali in 1833 and again in 1839–1840.

SULTAN MAHMUD II (1808–1839): CENTRALIZATION AND TRANSFORMATION

Some Western diplomatic historians view Mahmud II harshly, as the sultan who ruled during a period of increased dismemberment of Ottoman lands and who was overshadowed by his own governor, Muhammad Ali of Egypt. Yet despite the territorial losses during his reign, one might arguably present Mahmud II as the most effective of the late Ottoman sultans, a skillful and determined monarch whose rule achieved for the empire what Muhammad Ali's had for Egypt. Like Selim III, Mahmud II was primarily a military reformer. However, he differed from his ill-starred predecessor in seeing the need to act decisively against the centrifugal political forces that continued to paralyze royal authority.

Given the dominance of the derebey-ulama-Janissary coalition that had overthrown Selim III, Mahmud II proceeded cautiously. A campaign to reestablish central authority within the provinces occupied the first years of his reign. Using the Janissaries, whose loyalty he secured with bribes, Mahmud II succeeded in breaking the derebeys' power. By the 1820s, with the Greeks in revolt and Muhammad Ali demonstrating the superiority of his reformed military, Mahmud II ordered the creation of a new European-style army corps to which he intended to attach various Janissary units. The Janissaries, as they had done so often in the recent past, mounted a demonstration against the proposed reforms, but Mahmud II had prepared for the rebellion and used his new troops to crush it. Within a few hours on June 15, 1826, thousands of Janissaries were massacred on the streets and in their barracks, and the military institution that had once been the foundation of Ottoman power was destroyed forever.

The elimination of the Janissaries removed the major obstacle to further reform, and during the final thirteen years of his reign, Mahmud II instituted a rapid-paced program that transformed the traditional Ottoman order. His first priority was to rebuild his army along European lines. To avoid the charges of infidelism that had weakened Selim III, Mahmud II called his new European-trained force “the triumphant soldiers of Muhammad.” Further European influences penetrated the military through the educational infrastructure Mahmud II established: In 1827, a medical school for army personnel was founded in Istanbul, and in 1834, the sultan opened the Imperial War College, modeled on the French officers’ training academy at St. Cyr. Instruction at both of these institutions was in French. Following the example of Muhammad Ali, the sultan began sending groups of students to Europe for advanced study, thus ensuring a deeper commitment to European models among members of the new officer corps. In the same year that the Janissaries were destroyed, Mahmud II also abolished the sipahi units and formed a professional salaried cavalry. A related development was the elimination of the timar system in 1831.

Mahmud II’s reforms reached beyond the military. To increase the administrative efficiency of the state and to reestablish royal authority in the conduct of affairs, the sultan reorganized the bureaucracy. Abolishing old offices, he introduced new lines of responsibility in a move to create European-style ministries and raised salaries in an attempt to end bribery. Just as French uniforms symbolized the post-Janissary army, so the replacement of the turban and the robe by the fez and the frock coat among the bureaucracy represented Mahmud II’s efforts to force Europeanization on the civilian branches of government. In 1838 the sultan founded two institutions for the training of higher officials. Both offered a mixture of standard and secular subjects and, significantly, included instruction in French. To keep his officials informed of his programs, the sultan founded an official gazette, Takvim-i Vekayi (Calendar of Events), in 1831. The first newspaper published in the Ottoman-Turkish language, it became required reading for civil servants.

As we have seen, the Ottoman Empire was involved in a series of international diplomatic crises during Mahmud II’s reign. The paucity of officials with knowledge of a European language severely hampered the empire’s ability to negotiate treaties and alliances. Even the customary practice of employing Greek dragomans had to be abandoned as a result of the Greek revolt. In the 1830s Mahmud II moved to fill this void by reestablishing the Ottoman embassies in Europe and by opening a translation office to deal with state correspondence and to train Ottoman officials in European languages. Both the embassies and the translation office became training grounds for the next generation of civil servants.

Mahmud II's regime curbed the autonomy of the derebeys and destroyed the Janissaries. It reorganized the bureaucracy and made it dependent on the sultan's direct authority. A more delicate issue was how to limit the power of the leading ulama, who had been instrumental in Selim III's overthrow. Some ulama accepted the military reforms as necessary, but the entire religious establishment was independent of the central state and in command of considerable resources through its control of waqf revenues. Mahmud II attempted to circumscribe the authority of the shaykh al-Islam, the chief religious dignitary of the empire, by making his office part of the state bureaucracy. The sultan also tried to acquire control of waqf revenues by creating the Ministry of Religious Endowments (1826) to administer waqf income and direct any surplus to the state rather than allowing it to go to the religious establishment. Though not fully implemented during Mahmud II's reign, this centralization measure marked the beginning of state intervention in the financial affairs of the religious establishment and weakened the position of the ulama vis-à-vis the central government.

CONCLUSION

Despite the Ottoman territorial losses during Mahmud II's reign, his reforms strengthened the state's military and administrative arms. His legacy, like Muhammad Ali's, was the creation of an environment favoring the new elite—aptly termed “the French knowers.” As the sultan became committed to European reforms and as European economic and military pressure on the empire mounted, those who knew European ways and European languages received appointments to the highest military and civilian posts. The opponents of reform were eliminated or, as in the case of the ulama, gradually bypassed. After Mahmud II's death, this new elite, trained in the translation office, the European embassies, and the military academies, continued his reforms and inaugurated a new phase in the transformation of the Ottoman system.

CHAPTER 5

THE OTTOMAN EMPIRE AND EGYPT DURING THE ERA OF THE TANZIMAT

During the middle decades of the nineteenth century, the reforms Muhammad Ali and Mahmud II had inaugurated to revitalize their armed forces were extended into nonmilitary areas by their successors. The emulation of European methods of administration, education, and political organization brought about a continued expansion of the role of the state and was accompanied by a pressing need for qualified administrators and technical experts. Europeans filled many of these positions, but the new state-sponsored schools turned out increasing numbers of Ottoman and Egyptian graduates who quickly moved into the top ranks of the state hierarchy. Although the new Western-trained officials did not openly question the Islamic foundations of society, their policies tended to reduce the institutional significance of the religious establishment and to enhance the opportunities available to individuals trained as they were.

Throughout the period, European economic penetration of the Middle East acquired a new, more pervasive dimension. Added to the earlier sales of arms and other manufactured products was the provision of huge amounts of capital investment and easy access to credit. As the local reformers struggled to finance their projects, European banks and financiers stepped forward with loans that initially seemed favorable. However, these loans became the Achilles' heel of the reform movement, and the accumulation of indebtedness led directly to the British occupation of Egypt and to the loss of economic sovereignty in the Ottoman Empire.

THE TANZIMAT: CONTINUED OTTOMAN REFORM UNDER THE BUREAUCRATS

The period from 1839 to 1876 is known in Ottoman history as the Tanzimat (literally, reorganization) and marks the most intensive phase of nineteenth-century Ottoman reformist activity. The inspiration for reforms came not from the sultans but from Europeanized Ottoman bureaucrats, the French knowers, who were shaped by the institutions Mahmud II established.

The career patterns of the leading civilian reformers of the Tanzimat era show how different their experiences were from the preceding generation and how their rise to power reflected their exposure to Europe. The first fifteen years of the Tanzimat were dominated by Rashid Pasha (1800–1858), who acquired his credentials for high office through his service as Ottoman ambassador to Paris and London in the 1830s. He rose rapidly in the Ottoman administration and was minister of foreign affairs at the time of Mahmud II's death in 1839. He used this high position to gain exceptional influence and went on to hold the office of grand vizier six times and the position of foreign minister twice. His commitment to remake the governing institutions of the Ottoman Empire in the image of Europe drove him to promote the careers of like-minded younger men, the two most important of whom became his successors as leaders of reform. The career of the first of these disciples, Ali Pasha (1815–1871), serves to illuminate the relationship between knowledge of a European language and access to power in the changing Ottoman Empire of the mid-nineteenth century. An Istanbul shopkeeper's son, Ali became an employee in the translation office at age eighteen, and by age twenty-six, he was Ottoman ambassador to London. After five years there, Ali Pasha returned to Istanbul, where he became minister of foreign affairs in 1846 and grand vizier in 1852, a post he held several more times until his death. Ali Pasha's associate in the last two decades of the Tanzimat, Fuad Pasha (1815–1869), began his higher education at the military medical school founded by Mahmud II and then transferred to the translation office. This educational background opened up an appointment to the Ottoman embassy in London that in turn led to Fuad's promotion in 1852 to the first of what would be five terms as minister of foreign affairs. The thoroughly Europeanized Fuad Pasha was famous in diplomatic circles for his devastating wit expressed in perfect French. Once, when pressed by an Englishwoman to reveal how many wives he, as a Muslim, had, he replied, "The same as your husband—two, only he conceals one and I don't."¹ Rashid Pasha and his two disciples dominated the Tanzimat and, in collaboration with other bureaucrats whom they sometimes persuaded and sometimes coerced, were the driving forces behind the movement to transform the Ottoman administrative structure.

The most striking evidence of the empire's new direction is contained in two royal decrees that defined the essence of the Tanzimat. The first, the Hatt-i Sharif of Gülhane, was issued in 1839 at Rashid Pasha's insistence. The decree was not a piece of legislation but a statement of royal intent the sultan issued to his subjects. In it the Ottoman ruler promised certain administrative reforms, such as the abolition of tax farming, the standardization of military conscription, and the elimination of corruption. These sentiments had been expressed previously, but what made the Hatt-i Sharif so remarkable was the sultan's pledge to extend the reforms to all Ottoman subjects, regardless of their religion. In 1856, at the conclusion of the Crimean War, Ali and Fuad Pashas encouraged the promulgation of a second decree, the Hatt-i Hümayan, which repeated the principles of 1839 and made explicit the guarantees of the equality of all subjects. Thus, Muslim and non-Muslim were to have equal obligations in terms of military service and equal opportunities for state employment and admission to state schools.

The two decrees aimed to secure the loyalty of the empire's Christian subjects at a time of growing nationalist agitation in the European provinces. It appears that during the period of Ottoman decentralization in the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, the millets acquired greater autonomy than they had previously possessed. The decrees of 1839 and 1856 sought to break down the religious and cultural autonomy of the millets and to create the notion of a common Ottoman citizenship, or Ottomanism, which would in theory replace the religious ordering of society in which Muslims were dominant. The pledges were not fully implemented, as much due to Christian preference for new nationalist affiliations as to lingering Muslim feelings of superiority, but the attempt to replace religious affiliation with secular identity continued with the proclamation of a Nationality Law in 1869. This law reinforced the principle that all individuals living within Ottoman domains shared a common citizenship regardless of their religion. Together with the Nationality Law, the two decrees sharply broke with customary Ottoman attitudes and show the extent to which the reformers were prepared to go in attempting to keep the state together. To preserve the Ottoman Empire, they introduced the concept of the secular organization of society, which would have the long-term effect of undermining the entire basis of the Ottoman system.

During the Tanzimat, military improvements continued to receive attention, but the sphere of state-sponsored reforms was consciously extended to other areas as well. Thus, whereas Mahmud II's educational policies concentrated on training officers and physicians for the armed forces, the Tanzimat officials established institutions of higher learning for civilians. The two most important were the Civil Service School (1859) and the Imperial Ottoman Lycée at Galatasaray (1868). The impact of these schools, along with the earlier war college, on the formation of the Ottoman political and administrative elite is profound. Graduates from the three institutions enjoyed a high success rate in gaining state employment and occupied positions of authority in Turkey and the Arab states until well into the twentieth century.

The Tanzimat reformers also drew up proposals for an elaborate system of secondary schools and, in 1847, created a Ministry of Education as an arm of the state. Although the secondary schools developed slowly, the very act of creating them and placing them under the control of a central ministry constituted an expansion of the state's role in an area not previously considered part of its responsibility and marked another step toward the establishment of an educational system outside ulama control.

The Tanzimat was also a period for the promulgation of new legal codes. With the French civil code as the model, the state introduced new penal and commercial codes, established a system of secular courts called nizame to deal with cases involving Muslims and non-Muslims, and compiled a new civil code, the Mejelle. Completed in 1876, the Mejelle represents the combination of the new and the customary that characterized so much of the nineteenth-century Ottoman reform movement. On the one hand, it was based on the shari‘ah and ensured that no matter how much Western law might affect commercial or maritime codes, the civil code for the empire’s inhabitants would remain within an Islamic framework. On the other hand, European legal codes inspired the organization and arrangement of the Mejelle, and its administration was placed under the jurisdiction of the newly created Ministry of Justice.

If the Tanzimat era lacked the dramatic confrontations of the reigns of Selim III or Mahmud II, it nevertheless produced far-reaching changes in the Ottoman system. But some members of the Ottoman elite questioned the wisdom of the reforms, warning that the abandonment of long-standing Islamic institutions in favor of the hasty adoption of European models would spell disaster for the ummah of Muhammad.

The Young Ottomans

Accompanying the increased interaction between the Ottoman Empire and Europe was an Ottoman literary renaissance that found expression not just in established genres like poetry but also in new forms, especially the periodical press that flourished under private ownership in the Tanzimat’s last two decades. Among the main contributors to the new journalism were intellectuals and bureaucrats known as the Young Ottomans. Although not a coherent organization, they did share certain values they presented in their journals and newspapers.

The Young Ottomans represent an attempt to reconcile the new institutions of the Tanzimat with the Ottoman and Islamic political tradition. United in their dislike of the bureaucratic absolutism of Ali and Fuad Pashas, they called for a more democratic form of government. In their view, the two reformers had placed the empire in the worst position possible; it had been deprived of its essential Islamic political and social values but had not become more efficient through the forced adoption of European institutions. The Young Ottomans sought the best of both worlds: They called for the revitalization of the empire through the incorporation of selected European models and at the same time insisted on the retention of the Islamic foundations of state and society. Theirs was thus the complex vision of reformers and preservers. The democratic form of government they espoused was found, they claimed, in the Islamic tradition of consultation. This was not the participatory democracy emerging in Western Europe but rather a form of consultation between an absolutist ruler and his ministers. Reform was desirable, but it had to be grounded in the Islamic tradition.

Yet for all their insistence on the need to find sources of change within the Islamic tradition, the most pronounced impact of the Young Ottomans stemmed from their elaboration of the notion of Ottoman patriotism. The decrees of 1839 and 1856 had endorsed the concept of the equality of all Ottomans as citizens. In the 1860s and 1870s, the most prominent of the Young Ottomans, Namik Kemal, developed this concept to its secular conclusion in his poems and his famous play Vatan (Fatherland), all of which extolled the Ottoman fatherland and insisted that all Ottomans ought to share feelings of devotion to this territorial entity above any loyalties to their religious communities. This ideology marked the beginning of territorial patriotism, the belief in an Ottoman patrie to which its inhabitants owed primary allegiance. Thus, although Namik Kemal held firm convictions about the need to respect the Islamic foundations of Ottoman society, his ideological solution to the problem of Ottoman territorial disintegration was of European inspiration.

The Ottoman Constitution of 1876

While studying in Europe, some members of the new Ottoman elite concluded that Europe's success rested not just with its technical achievements but also with its political organizations. Moreover, the process of reform itself had imbued a small segment of this elite with the belief that constitutional government would be a desirable check on autocracy and provide them with a better opportunity to influence policy. These sentiments became more widespread when, following Ali Pasha's death in 1871, Sultan Abdul Aziz reasserted royal authority. His chaotic rule led to his deposition in 1876 and, after a few troubled months, to the proclamation of an Ottoman constitution that the new sultan, Abdul Hamid II, pledged to uphold.

Although the constitution provided for an elected chamber of deputies and an appointed senate, it restricted the sultan's powers only minimally. He retained the right to make war and peace, to appoint and dismiss ministers, to approve legislation, and to convene and dismiss the chamber of deputies. Yet despite the latitude it gave to the sovereign, the constitution provided clear evidence of the extent to which European influences operated among a section of the Ottoman bureaucracy. The constitution also reaffirmed the equality of all Ottoman subjects, including their right to serve in the new chamber of deputies. In a significant omission, the millets were not mentioned. The constitution was more than a political document; it was a proclamation of Ottomanism and Ottoman patriotism, and it was an assertion that the empire was capable of resolving its problems and that it had the right to remain intact as it then existed.

Unfortunately for the constitution's framers, Sultan Abdul Hamid II did not share their fondness for limited monarchy. In 1878, after only two sessions of the chamber of deputies, he dissolved the assembly, suspended the constitution, and inaugurated thirty years of autocratic rule (see Chapter 7).

Ottoman Finances

As the Ottoman Empire expanded its administrative apparatus and sought to maintain a modern army and navy supplied with weapons and warships purchased abroad, its financial strains became acute. The problem for the Tanzimat reformers was that they had launched expensive new programs while the sources of state revenues remained fairly constant. To cover its annual budget deficits, the empire took out loans on the European money markets. The first loan, for 3.3 million Ottoman lire, was arranged in 1854 during the Crimean War. Over the next twenty years, the Ottomans contracted an additional fifteen loans, totaling over 200 million Ottoman lira (about 180 million sterling). As was to happen in Egypt, the increased level of debt meant that more and more funds had to be diverted from the empire's operating budget and directed instead to paying loan interest. By 1874 about 60 percent of the state's total expenditure was servicing the debt —an impossible burden.² In 1876 the government failed to make all of its payments, so in effect the Ottoman Empire was bankrupt.

European diplomats rushed in to protect European creditors. A resolution of the immediate crisis came with the Decree of Muhamarram (1881), which authorized the establishment of an Ottoman Public Debt Administration and pledged certain state revenues to service the debt. The real effect of the decree, however, was the surrender of Ottoman financial independence to European interests. Comprising representatives of the main creditors, the Public Debt Administration was authorized to collect designated revenues and use them to pay the interest on the debt. These payments had priority over all other Ottoman expenditures. But the debt continued to burden the empire and its successor states, and only in 1954 did the government of Turkey fully repay its share.

The Diplomacy of the Tanzimat: Patterns of European Pressure on the Ottoman Empire

The numerous crises of the Eastern Question significantly influenced Ottoman foreign and domestic policies during the second half of the nineteenth century. The purpose here is not to explore each war and treaty but to depict in broad strokes how the unfolding of the Eastern Question affected the Ottoman Empire.

While busy with internal reorganization, Ottoman civilian reformers also had to contend with renewed Russian expansion into Ottoman territory. Russia carried this out in three main ways: first, by using its religious ties with the empire's Greek Orthodox subjects to gain influence in Ottoman internal affairs; second, by allying itself, on the basis of common religious and Slavic cultural bonds, to the Balkan independence movements in an effort to become the Great Power patron of whatever new states might emerge; and, third, by direct warfare against Ottoman armies. The other Great Power neighbor of the Ottomans, the Austro-Hungarian Empire of the Hapsburgs, conducted a more cautious foreign policy than Russia. Austria, after all, faced a problem similar to that of the Ottomans; it too was a multiethnic state whose subject peoples were responding to the appeal of nationalism. Nevertheless, Austria was always willing to gain territory at Ottoman expense when the right occasion presented itself. One such occasion arose in the circumstances surrounding the Crimean War.

The Crimean War (1854–1856) was precipitated by Russian attempts to gain direct authority over the Orthodox Christian subjects of the Ottoman Empire. For centuries, Orthodox and Catholic priests, supported respectively by Russia and France, had competed with one another over the rights to supervise the holy shrines in Jerusalem. The Ottomans regarded these matters as trivial and granted various privileges to the clergy of both faiths. The issue resurfaced in the 1840s and reached a climax in 1853 when Russia presented an ultimatum to the Ottoman government demanding that it sign a joint accord guaranteeing the position of the Orthodox Christians in the empire. This would have given Russia the right to intervene on behalf of approximately 8 million Ottoman subjects. The sultan rejected the ultimatum.

Russia's subsequent deployment of troops into the principalities (Moldavia and Wallachia) prompted France and Britain to rally to the cause of Ottoman resistance to Russian advances. This response was in keeping with the principle of the balance of power that characterized Eastern Question diplomacy: No Great Power (Russia in this case) was to be allowed to acquire unilateral territorial gains at Ottoman expense. If the powers could not agree on an equal division of Ottoman spoils, then groups of them (France and Britain in this instance) formed coalitions to prevent one of their members from gaining a unilateral advantage. This pattern of behavior was also designed to avoid warfare among the Great Powers over Ottoman lands. However, in the 1853 crisis, the system broke down. When war was finally declared, it was fought on Russian territory in the Crimea, where the British, French, and Ottoman allies bungled their way to an indecisive victory over the Russians. While the armies of the four powers were fighting it out in the Crimea, Austria occupied the principalities.

The Treaty of Paris (1856) brought an end to the hostilities and arranged for the readjustment of boundaries. Among other things, the signatories pledged to respect the territorial integrity of the Ottoman Empire. But this pledge came late in that, as a result of the war, the principalities were well on their way to becoming independent as a united Romanian state. The treaty further arranged for the demilitarization of the Black Sea and the withdrawal of Russian troops from the Danube. These were severe blows to Russian ambitions. Consequently, for the next twenty years Russian foreign policy was directed toward overturning the treaty's restrictions.

An opportunity presented itself during the wars and revolts known as the Great Eastern Crisis of 1875–1878. By the time of the crisis, Pan-Slavism had gained adherents in Russian political and intellectual circles as well as among Slavic Balkan nationalist leaders. Pan-Slavism was a mixture of Orthodox Christian and Slavic cultural sentiments that combined to create the idea of a Russian mission to liberate the Slavic peoples—Serbs, Croatians, Slovenes, and Bulgarians—from Ottoman rule and unite them into a vast federation. Slav nationalists who wanted nothing to do with a Russian-dominated Slavic federation could nonetheless use Pan-Slavism to gain Russian support for their independence movements.

When anti-Ottoman rebellions broke out in Bosnia in 1875 and in Bulgaria the next year, both movements sought Russian intervention. However, the Ottomans quickly and brutally suppressed the Bulgarian revolt, giving Russia an excuse to take up its fellow Slavs' cause. In 1877, Russia declared war on the Ottoman Empire. The reformed Ottoman military fought well at the start, but the Russian forces gradually drove the Ottomans out of Bulgaria, and in early 1878, the Russian army captured Adrianople and imposed a harsh treaty on the Ottomans. Now Britain, seeing its entire Middle Eastern policy threatened, prepared for war with Russia. But the intervention of Chancellor Otto von Bismarck of Germany averted hostilities, and instead of fighting over control of Ottoman territories, the powers met at the Congress of Berlin in 1878 to find a peaceful method of dismantling the Ottoman Empire. That is precisely what the congress achieved through various agreements: The European powers kept peace among themselves by awarding one another bits of Ottoman territory. In this instance, the principle of the balance of power operated as the Great Powers had intended it to.

The Ottoman losses were considerable. Serbia, Montenegro, Romania, and part of Bulgaria were recognized as independent states; Russia gained Kars and Batum in eastern Anatolia; and Austria was granted the right to administer the province of Bosnia. In addition, Britain, the ally of the Ottomans, demanded control over Cyprus in exchange for continued British support. (Ottoman permission was not really necessary, as Britain had already occupied Cyprus for use as a base from which to protect its eastern Mediterranean interests.)

The Berlin settlement was announced during the second year of Sultan Abdul Hamid's reign. It is no wonder that for the rest of his long sultanate, he was suspicious of and hostile to Europeans. Nor should it be any wonder that the Tanzimat officials, for all their concern with administrative reform, should have continued to devote immense sums to military modernization. The development of effective armed forces was not a luxury but a basic requirement for survival.

THE ARAB PROVINCES OF GREATER SYRIA DURING THE TANZIMAT

Although the Tanzimat reforms brought greater efficiency to the Ottoman administration of the Arab provinces, they also disrupted the political and social arrangements that had preserved relative communal harmony for nearly 300 years. Adding to the disruption of long-established patterns of life was the European economic penetration of Greater Syria during the second half of the nineteenth century.

From the Egyptian Occupation to the Riots of 1860

Greater Syria (which included the present-day states of Syria, Lebanon, Israel and the Palestinian territories, and Jordan) contained the largest concentration of Ottoman Christian subjects outside Europe. The governorship of Muhammad Ali's son Ibrahim (1831–1840) affected the relations between Muslims and Christians throughout the region but especially in Mount Lebanon, the local name for the entire Lebanon mountain range except its most northern parts. Because of its isolation from administrative control, Mount Lebanon had long served as a place of refuge for dissident religious groups. In the early nineteenth century, two sects, the Maronite Christians and the Druze, shared political power there. The Druze were a dissident offshoot of Shi'ism dating from the eleventh century. Although less numerous than the Maronites, the Druze were fierce defenders of their sectarian identity, and their chieftains were accepted as equal members of the social order. Over the centuries, the two communities had worked out informal arrangements that allowed for a rough-and-ready tolerance between them. Ibrahim's notions of interventionist administration would destroy those arrangements.

Ibrahim insisted that the government treat all the religious communities in Greater Syria equally, and he abolished the special taxes that Jews and Christians had to pay on their places of worship. However, his most disruptive policy was the introduction of universal conscription and the simultaneous attempt to disarm the local population. When certain Druze communities refused to surrender their weapons in 1837, Ibrahim armed several thousand Christians and sent them against the Druze. The Christian forces took advantage of this opportunity to enlarge their own territory. In 1839, Ibrahim had a change of heart and ordered the Christians to return their arms. Refusing this demand, they took part in an uprising of all the religious communities against Ibrahim, an event that helped force the Egyptian evacuation.

Greater Syria returned to Ottoman rule, but sectarian relations had been profoundly changed. The Maronites had acquired increased power within Mount Lebanon and a new freedom within Syrian society that they were not inclined to surrender. Encouraged by the promises of equality contained in the Ottoman decrees of 1839 and 1856, Maronites and other Christians expanded their commercial activities, entered into lucrative relationships with Europeans, founded new educational institutions, and generally asserted themselves in a manner that the Druze and Sunnis saw as overstepping the bounds of what was permitted to minority subjects in a Muslim state. Smoldering Muslim resentment over this change in the accepted social and political order erupted into a brutal civil war. It began in 1860 with Druze attacks on Christian villages in Mount Lebanon and soon spilled over into the quarters of Damascus, where several thousand Christians were massacred and European consulates were burned.

To restore order and forestall direct European intervention in the crisis, an Ottoman military force was dispatched to Damascus, and Fuad Pasha himself arrived to ensure the punishment of Muslims deemed responsible for the massacres. These actions failed to satisfy the European powers, however, and in 1861, a conference of European representatives met in Istanbul to work out a formula that would protect the safety of the Christian population. The proposed solution was the creation of an autonomous administrative status for Mount Lebanon. This involved the establishment of a small, newly formed political unit, the mutasarrifiyyah, which was to be governed by a non-Lebanese Ottoman Christian subject and protected by a guarantee of the European powers (see Map 12.1). The governor worked through an advisory council in which the district's religious communities were represented. Although the mutasarrifiyyah appeared to be an awkward political entity, it provided its inhabitants with peace and prosperity until its abolition in 1914. However, because it was organized along sectarian lines, it did not soften communal distinctions but rather served as a daily reminder of them.

The Social and Economic Impact of the Tanzimat

From the beginning of Ottoman rule in the Arab lands, officials from Istanbul and the local urban notables alike recognized the need for cooperation. A pattern of interaction emerged that has been termed the politics of the notables.³ Most pronounced in the cities of Syria, the politics of the notables rested on the satisfaction of mutual interests. An Ottoman governor could not exercise effective authority without the assistance of the local dignitaries, who had their own independent power base. The local notables, in turn, required access to the governor and, through him, to Istanbul if they were to satisfy their clients' needs. In this delicate relationship, the notables played the role of intermediaries, gently reminding the governor of their interests while helping him see that the demands of government were also met. The Tanzimat policy of adopting codes of administrative conduct that took precedence over personal relationships threatened to upset the balance between the notables and the state and to undermine their privileges. How could the notables retain their power and status in the changing political climate?

One way was to take advantage of economic opportunities arising from Europeans' commercial penetration of the Levant. Beginning in the 1830s, European commercial activity along the Syrian coast expanded enormously, mainly through the port of Beirut, which rapidly grew into a major economic and cultural center. As the Ottoman Empire was drawn into the international market, its economic survival depended on the development of exports for Europe. In the case of Greater Syria, this meant increasing the cultivation of such agricultural products as wheat and barley. To make the switch from subsistence to commercial agriculture, the urban notables brought large tracts of new land under cultivation. Their ability to use one of the major reform decrees of the Tanzimat to their advantage aided their acquisition of new holdings.

The Ottoman land code of 1858 was a centralizing measure designed to regularize landholding patterns and boost the tax-collecting efficiency of the central government. It was also supposed to protect the peasant cultivator by allowing him to register his lands and thus deal directly with the state instead of with tax farmers. The law required all landowners to register their land with the government; in return, they would receive a written title deed. It further permitted individuals to purchase and register previously unoccupied state lands. Although the impact of the land law varied from region to region, in parts of Greater Syria it led to the creation of vast private estates. Individual notables bought huge tracts of uncultivated state lands with the intention of developing them for commercial agricultural purposes. In other instances, peasant cultivators, distrustful of the law's aims, chose to register their lands in the name of their local notable patron, who would see things right with the government, they assumed. They were mistaken. By these and other means, the local notables acquired ownership of large tracts of valuable commercial land, thus expanding their wealth and influence.

Although the local Arab notables generally opposed the Tanzimat, they could see that positions of administrative authority in the changing Ottoman state were going to young men trained in the government schools. Beginning in the 1870s, many leading Arab families therefore enrolled their sons in Istanbul's higher academies. Upon completing their studies, these youths obtained positions in the Ottoman bureaucracy, thus giving their families access to the government. Indeed, throughout the Tanzimat, the Arab urban elite managed to preserve their privileges and to make themselves indispensable to the Ottoman officials sent out from Istanbul. The politics of the notables survived the centralizing reforms.

EGYPT DURING THE ERA OF CIVILIAN REFORM

From Muhammad Ali to Isma‘il, 1848–1863

Of Muhammad Ali’s two immediate successors, Abbas (1848–1854) lacked his father’s ruling skills as well as his commitment to reform, and Sa‘id (1854–1863), though he intensified Egypt’s contacts with Europe, was an ineffective ruler. Nevertheless, the momentum of Muhammad Ali’s administrative reforms carried over to their reigns, and the central government continued to broaden and to become more functionally specialized with the creation of new ministries and councils. And as was the case in the central Ottoman Empire, a new elite of officials trained in Europe or in European-style Egyptian institutions filled the administrative positions required to carry out the increased range of state activities.

The career of Ali Mubarak (1823–1893), one of the most influential and talented of Egypt’s nineteenth-century reformers, illustrates this trend. Born in a Delta village, Mubarak attended a government preparatory school before being admitted to the Cairo School of Engineering. The top student in his class, he was chosen to be a member of a student military mission to France in 1844. After two years in Paris, he was assigned to the school for artillery officers and military engineers at Metz. Returning to Egypt in 1849, he was given a modest appointment as instructor in the artillery school. But after only one year, he received a remarkable promotion to become director of the entire system of government schools. Ali Mubarak was the first native Egyptian Muslim to obtain such a high-ranking position. It marked the start of a rich career of public service that spanned nearly four decades and included appointments as head of the ministries of education, public works, and railways. Mubarak demonstrated extraordinary skills as an educator, engineer, and administrator. His opportunity to shape several areas of Egyptian life was made possible in part by his transit through the state-sponsored educational system of local and European technical schools.

This was also the case with another native Egyptian, Rifa‘a al-Tahtawi (1801–1873), who powerfully influenced the direction of his country’s cultural life. Educated at the traditional Islamic university, al-Azhar, al-Tahtawi appeared headed for a career as a member of the ulama until Muhammad Ali chose him to accompany one of the early missions to Paris in 1826. Al-Tahtawi’s official role was imam, or religious guide, but he persuaded the Egyptian authorities to allow him to study with the other members of the mission. By the time he left Paris five years later, al-Tahtawi had absorbed the principal works of French political thought and become a shrewd observer of French customs. Upon his return to Egypt, he was instrumental in persuading Muhammad Ali to found the School of Languages (1835), an institution that in Egypt played a role similar to the translation office in the Ottoman Empire. As the school's director for fifteen years, al-Tahtawi supervised the translation of 2,000 works from foreign languages into Arabic. He also wrote several books, including an account of his student days in Paris that contained favorable comments on French society.

For Mubarak and al-Tahtawi, the path to state employment passed through Paris. Other members of the new administrative elite would have similar experiences. The cumulative effect of their European training had been to create a group of officials who were familiar with the West and admired certain aspects of European civilization. Consequently, these men used their positions of authority to encourage the adoption of Western ideas and Western systems of education and administration.

With the elimination of Muhammad Ali's monopoly system and the abandonment of his industrialization policy, the needs of the European market came to shape Egypt's economic development. The country became integrated into the international economic order as a virtual plantation economy, exporting raw materials, most notably cotton, and importing European manufactured goods. The massive export of cotton required dependable transportation, and in 1852, Egypt entered the railway age with the completion of the first rail link between Cairo and Alexandria. At the same time that the country's internal communications were being improved, the establishment of regular steamship lines between Alexandria and several Mediterranean ports more closely linked it to the international commercial network. The project that, above all others, was to consolidate Egypt's linkage to international shipping had its beginnings in 1854, when the Egyptian ruler Sa'id granted the French engineer Ferdinand de Lesseps the concession to construct a canal across the Isthmus of Suez from the Mediterranean to the Red Sea. The agreement was a financial disaster for Egypt and contributed to the country's plunge into bankruptcy. In addition, bitterness over de Lesseps's manipulation of Egypt and its rulers became embedded in the national consciousness.

But de Lesseps was not the only European entrepreneur attempting to profit from the economic opportunities Egypt offered. Reputable firms and marginal operators, skilled technicians and common laborers, all attracted by the wealth to be made in transport construction, the cotton exchange, and concession hunting, poured into the country in the 1850s and 1860s. By 1872, an estimated 80,000 Europeans, over half of them Greeks and Italians, resided in Egypt. Exempted by the Capitulations from taxation and from the jurisdiction of the Egyptian government, they sought and received protection from their consuls whenever their scandalous social behavior or irregular financial dealings attracted the attention of the Egyptian authorities. The consuls themselves exercised extensive political and economic influence in Egyptian affairs, and their offices became centers of nearly autonomous power in Cairo and Alexandria.

Some of the Europeans who came to Egypt obtained employment in the state service, mostly as skilled technicians such as train drivers, steamship pilots, and mechanics. Others received more lucrative positions, among them minister of railways and communications. These appointments of foreigners occurred just as Egyptian officials like Mubarak and al-Tahtawi were demonstrating their own qualifications for high office. Tensions flared between Egyptians eager for the influence and rewards they felt they deserved and Europeans equally determined to cash in. By the time of Sa‘id’s death in 1863, Europeans, with their economic privileges, diplomatic protection, and often patronizing manner, had become a source of irritation at all levels of Egyptian society. The situation would become exacerbated with Isma‘il’s rule.

Isma‘il the Magnificent (1863–1879)

Isma‘il is one of the most controversial figures in modern Egyptian history, a foolish spendthrift to some and a farsighted if extravagant reformer to others. Whatever judgment one may pass on this grandson of Muhammad Ali, there can be little doubt that his policies affected Egyptian domestic development and external relations well into the twentieth century. Isma‘il’s objective was the complete Europeanization of Egypt in as short a time as possible. Personally familiar with the Paris of Napoleon III and the Istanbul of the Tanzimat, Isma‘il made little attempt to blend his reformist programs into long-standing Egyptian-Islamic traditions. “My country,” he reportedly proclaimed, “is no longer in Africa, it is now in Europe,” and he set out to make this statement true.⁴

With a thoroughness never envisaged by Muhammad Ali, Isma‘il encouraged the development of a European-educated Egyptian elite. He increased the budget for education more than tenfold and embarked on a program to expand the primary and secondary school systems and to found specialized technical and vocational institutions. Two of the latter deserve special mention. Dar al-Ulum, founded in 1872 at Ali Mubarak’s urging, was intended to retrain graduates of the religious schools to become teachers of Arabic in the new national primary and secondary system. As the principal modern teacher training college in the country, Dar al-Ulum became one of the largest and most successful of the new postsecondary institutions. The School of Languages, reopened in 1868, was far more elitist and European oriented. By 1886, the institution had evolved into the Cairo School of Law, offering its students a French-based legal education that made them sought-after candidates for state employment. Isma‘il also revived the practice of sending student educational missions to Europe and began the process of turning female education into a responsibility of the state. Beyond these educational reforms, Isma‘il founded a national library in 1871 and, later, a number of learned societies and museums.

Although Isma‘il encouraged the formation of a Western-trained elite, he made no attempt to alter the relationship between the monarchy and the people. An authoritarian ruler, he dispensed and withheld royal patronage at his pleasure. Much attention has been given to his establishment of a consultative chamber of delegates in 1866. But Isma‘il did not surrender any of his prerogatives to the chamber, and he created it as much out of tactical considerations as for the purpose of consultation. On the question of Egypt’s relationship to the Ottoman Empire, Isma‘il secured modest gains. Whereas Muhammad Ali had attempted to establish his independence through warfare, Isma‘il’s method was to shower Ottoman officials with gifts and bribes. When Sultan Abdul Aziz paid an official state visit to Egypt in 1863, the first Ottoman sultan to set foot in the country since Selim I conquered it in 1517, Isma‘il spared no expense in entertaining his sovereign. These efforts were rewarded when the sultan elevated Isma‘il to khedive, a Persian term meaning lord or master and implying something closer to royalty than the position of governor does. In addition, Egypt was granted the right to expand its army, to issue its own currency, and to contract foreign loans without the sultan’s approval, a privilege Isma‘il pursued with relish.

In the legal realm, the most significant development during Isma‘il’s reign was the introduction of the Mixed Courts. The increase in the number of foreigners conducting business in Egypt brought a concurrent increase in the number of disputes between foreigners and Egyptians. Under the Capitulations, which sheltered foreign nationals from Egyptian law, the usual method of dealing with such disputes was to have the consul of the foreigner hear the case and render a decision based on the law of the foreigner’s country. In these circumstances foreigners rarely were convicted, no matter how grave their alleged offenses. To protect Egyptians from this abuse and to bring uniformity to a practice in which dozens of different consuls rendered judgments based on the legal codes of several different countries, the Mixed Courts were established in 1876 to deal with all civil and commercial cases to which foreigners were party. Operating until 1949, the Mixed Courts were governed by the French civil code and staffed by judges who were appointed for life and thus free from dismissal for political reasons. An important related development was the opening of the National Courts in 1884. These courts had jurisdiction over all Egyptians in matters of civil, commercial, and penal law and, like the Mixed Courts, operated on legal codes drawn from French law. Although some Egyptian judges were employed in the new justice system, European judges generally received the choice appointments.

Even as European judges, lawyers, and legal codes came to dominate the Egyptian justice system, the shari‘ah courts continued to exist. But because their jurisdiction was confined to the areas of personal status and waqf, ulama legal activity was severely restricted. At the same time, however, splendid opportunities arose for Egyptians trained in French law. Those who could afford it enrolled in the Cairo School of Law or pursued legal studies in France. Thus was Egyptian society set in conflict with itself.

Isma‘il’s determination to transform Egypt into a European country drove him to devote enormous sums to copying the external trappings of European civilization. He refashioned sections of Cairo on the model of Paris and provided them with boulevards and parks serviced by waterworks, gaslights, and tramways. Isma‘il also sank huge sums into the construction of railways, bridges, and new facilities at the port of Alexandria. But the crowning achievement in the field of transport was the completion of the Suez Canal in 1869, an occasion Isma‘il celebrated by entertaining European royalty and dignitaries in lavish ceremonies. The canal quickly became a major international waterway benefiting all maritime states by reducing the distance and thus the costs of transporting goods and passengers between the East and Europe. Britain, with its imperial possessions in India and the Far East and its position as the leading overseas trading nation of the time, gained the most from the canal: The waterway cut the distance from London to Bombay in half, and by 1881, more than 80 percent of the traffic through the canal was British.

Isma‘il’s vast expenditures were fueled by cotton. The Union blockade of Confederate ports during the American Civil War forced British textile mills to turn almost exclusively to Egypt for their cotton supply. In what was a tremendous economic boom, Egypt's cotton exports shot up from 918,000 sterling in the early 1850s to over 10 million in the late 1860s.⁵ Land became a valued economic asset, and officials who received land grants from Isma'il used their profits from cotton to purchase additional holdings. An increase in private landholdings was a prominent feature of Isma'il's reign; he himself controlled one-fifth of all the cultivated land in the country.

But even the large revenues generated by the cotton boom could not keep pace with Isma'il's expenditures. To finance his ambitious schemes and expensive personal tastes, the khedive borrowed huge sums from European financial institutions. The practice proved disastrous. Brokerage commissions and various hidden charges reduced the value of the loans before they were paid out. In addition, the European lenders' high interest rates (usually around 10 percent) diverted funds from the Egyptian economy. As Egypt sank into debt, Isma'il took desperate measures to keep his creditors at bay. In 1872, he issued the muqabala law, which allowed landholders to pay six times their annual land tax in advance in exchange for relief from all future land tax obligations. In 1875 Egypt sold its 44 percent interest in the Suez Canal Company to the British government for £4 million, but this sale provided only stopgap revenue. By the 1870s, new loans were being used simply to meet the interest payments on previous loans. In 1876, the Egyptian government announced that it intended to suspend interest payments on its debt for three months, a statement that amounted to a declaration of bankruptcy. That same year, the Ottoman government defaulted on its interest payments.

However, the consequences would be more severe for Cairo than Istanbul, as Egypt's economic problems would lead to its loss of political independence over the next six years. The political crisis began to unfold when European financial houses pressured their governments to take actions to prevent Egypt from defaulting on its loan payments. Wanting to placate his creditors, Isma'il agreed in 1876 to the establishment of a body known as the Caisse de la Dette Publique (Public Debt Commission). Composed of four representatives from the European creditor nations, the commission was charged with ensuring that the Egyptian debt was serviced.

In addition, two controllers, respectively from Britain and France, were appointed to the Egyptian government to supervise the expenditure of Egyptian revenues. This system of dual control, as it was known, amounted to direct European intervention in Egypt's financial affairs. When Isma'il attempted to preserve his financial independence by dismissing the two controllers and rallying popular support, the European powers decided his reign must end and called upon the Ottoman sultan to exercise the authority he still possessed over Egypt. Sultan Abdul Hamid II, not sorry to see the removal of such a troublesome prince, issued a formal decree deposing Isma'il in 1879 and appointing his son Tawfiq as khedive.

The Urabi Revolt, 1879–1882

The deposition of Isma'il and the accession of the weak Tawfiq gave the European powers freedom to arrange the disbursement of Egyptian revenues as they saw fit. In 1880, Tawfiq issued the Law of Liquidation, which established Egypt's consolidated debt at the staggering total of £98.4 million (it had been £3 million when Isma'il assumed the throne) and set up a procedure for making regular annual payments on the debt. These payments were given priority over all other state expenditures and amounted to more than 60 percent of Egypt's annual revenue; Isma'il had mortgaged his country to European financiers.

Isma'il's deposition may have brought a measure of financial order to Egypt, but it did not bring political stability. Discontent within the elite and among elements of the population at large sparked a reaction against European interference and led to the emergence of a figure whom some regard as Egypt's first nationalist hero.

Ahmad Urabi was an Egyptian of peasant origins who had risen to the rank of colonel in the army. Not one of the European-educated officers, he had studied first at al-Azhar and then gone into the army. Perhaps because of his peasant background and traditional training, he came to be seen in some quarters as representing the authentic voice of the Egyptian people. It was the voice of a peasant population whose labor and taxes had produced the wealth for Isma'il's grandiose schemes, the voice of impoverished rural discontent against tax-exempt foreigners and wealthy local landlords. The Urabi movement began with a relatively minor incident within the officer corps. In early 1881, Colonel Urabi and a group of fellow Egyptian officers protested an impending law that would prevent Egyptians of fellaḥ (peasant) origin from rising through the ranks to officer status. When it became clear that large portions of the army supported Urabi, Khedive Tawfiq rescinded the offensive law. But the movement did not stop there. What began as an internal protest on an army matter was elevated by Urabi and his supporters to a national campaign against European domination of Egypt's affairs.

The politics of Urabi's movement was made exceedingly complex by the shifting coalitions of notables and high-ranking officials who alternately opposed and endorsed him. However, the movement had two essential purposes: to eliminate foreign control of Egypt's finances and to curtail the khedive's autocracy by establishing constitutional limits to his authority. Urabi gained the support of the army, a group of reformist notables, and the peasantry, who looked upon him as the leader who would free them from their bondage of taxation and indebtedness. In 1882 Urabi was appointed minister of war and began to make provisions for the formation of a national assembly that would have the power to determine Egypt's budget and spending priorities. While Urabi and his supporters asserted their rights to manage their country's affairs, Khedive Tawfiq depended on foreign support to preserve his throne.

The Urabi movement represented a double-edged threat to the governments of Britain and France. They refused to believe that an Urabist government would honor its international financial obligations. In addition, they were alarmed at the prospect of a nationalist government restricting their access to the Suez Canal. They preferred the rule of the pliable Khedive Tawfiq to the difficulties of dealing with an Urabist government that was responsive to Egyptian needs. Reacting to an outbreak of antiforeign rioting in Alexandria in June 1882, the British government authorized the commander of the fleet anchored off Alexandria harbor to bombard the city. In August came the fateful decision to land a British expeditionary force at the canal zone. On September 13, 1882, the British forces defeated Urabi's army at the battle of Tel al-Kebir, and two days later, Urabi was captured and his movement quelled. In ordering the invasion of Egypt, the British government intended only a brief interventionist action to restore Khedive Tawfiq's authority; instead, it inaugurated an occupation that lasted until 1956. Egypt had become a part of Europe, but not in the way Isma'il had intended.

The British and the khedive portrayed Urabi as a traitor to his government; he was tried and sentenced to exile in Ceylon. But to his Egyptian supporters and for those to whom he later became a legend, Urabi was a patriot whose goal was to preserve his country's independence from foreign economic control. The popular cry of his followers, "Egypt for the Egyptians," would be heard again.

CONCLUSION: THE DUALISM OF THE NINETEENTH-CENTURY REFORMS

The reforms in the Ottoman Empire and Egypt created an institutional dualism in Middle Eastern society. With the notable exceptions of the destruction of the Janissaries and the Mamluks, most traditional institutions survived alongside the newly created ones. Thus, although the Ottoman and Egyptian governments introduced new legal codes and new court systems, they did not eliminate the shari'ah courts. Moreover, although both governments devoted considerable funds to developing elite European-style academies, they did not close the doors of the religious schools, which continued to preserve Islamic learned tradition, to transmit Islamic values, and to provide educational opportunities for large numbers of students.

The problem arose when the graduates of the Islamic schools sought employment in administrations that were committed to Westernization. No matter how extensive these students' knowledge of the Quran or the shari'ah, they did not have the qualifications to compete with students trained in Europe or in European-style schools. At the same time, the opportunities for employment in the traditional elite sector of society were shrinking as the new courts, new schools, and new concepts deriving from European thought reduced the role of the ulama to the more narrowly religious sphere of activity. The favored new elite of French knowers, small though it may have been, increasingly dominated in state affairs, whereas the religiously educated found their once-respected training to have limited application. The wrenching nature of imposed change is captured in the remark of Fuad Pasha, the Ottoman minister, to a European diplomat: “Our state is the strongest state. For you are trying to cause its collapse from the outside, and we from the inside, but still it does not collapse.”⁶

This dualism had a divisive effect on society as a whole. A wide gap had always separated educated officials from the population at large. But as these officials came increasingly from Westernized schools, the gap widened. An illiterate conscript from rural Anatolia and his commanding officer who might have been trained in Paris inhabited two different universes. So too did an al-Azhar shaykh and a professor in the Cairo Medical School. Nor was the gap between the new elite and the traditional sectors of society bridged by the transmission of any obvious benefits to the latter group. To the Egyptian fellahin, the transformation of society meant conscription in Muhammad Ali’s armies or Isma‘il’s public works gangs; it meant heavy taxes and rising indebtedness; it meant abandoning the family plot of land and joining the growing ranks of rural laborers working for atrociously low wages on the vast estates of wealthy private landowners.

The impact was similar in the rural heartlands of the Ottoman Empire. As the nineteenth-century transformation brought certain advantages to Egyptian and Ottoman society, it also brought economic hardship, social disruption, and political exploitation.

CHAPTER 6

EGYPT AND IRAN IN THE LATE NINETEENTH CENTURY

During the final decades of the nineteenth century, the major European powers expanded their overseas empires and, whenever possible, protected their principal imperial possessions by entering into agreements among themselves or by neutralizing the rulers of territories bordering on those possessions. Britain, for example, had started to secure the route to India by annexing Aden in 1839 and by establishing treaties with some of the Arab shaykhdoms in the Persian Gulf. Additional shaykhdoms were brought under British control as first Bahrain (1880), then Muscat (1891), and finally Kuwait (1899) signed treaties pledging not to deal with any foreign power except through Britain. The French North African empire, begun with the conquest of Algiers in 1830, was made more secure with the occupation of Tunisia in 1881; Morocco would be incorporated into this empire in 1912. Italy, in a desperate search for overseas possessions, invaded the Ottoman North African province of Tripoli in 1911. And Russia, though continuing to seek territorial gains in Ottoman Europe, was also in the process of acquiring a huge Asian empire. As will be seen in this chapter, Egypt, Iran, and the Sudan were all drawn into this Great Power rivalry, usually to the detriment of their own interests.

ENGLAND ON THE NILE: THE BRITISH OCCUPATION OF EGYPT, 1882–1914

The Cromer Years, 1883–1907

The British occupation of Egypt produced one of the most significant colonial encounters of the modern era. It shaped Egyptian economic development for several decades, had an impact on the formation of the country's political leadership, and became the focus of an anti-imperial nationalist movement that affected Egyptian (and British) politics for the first half of the twentieth century.

Britain occupied Egypt to safeguard the Suez Canal, to restore Egypt's political and financial stability and, in the context of the imperial competition of the era, to prevent France from occupying it first. Britain did not intend to engage in a prolonged occupation, and it certainly did not intend to get involved in the task of governing Egyptians. Until the outbreak of World War I, Britain could not even define its relationship to Egypt; the country was not declared a colony or a protectorate but remained in theory an autonomous province of the Ottoman Empire ruled by a hereditary khedive. Although undefined, however, the British presence was, as its critics pointed out, simply a veiled protectorate.

The individual who presided over the occupation with absolute authority for its first quarter century was Evelyn Baring, later Lord Cromer, a colonial administrator with several years' service in India. Cromer's attitude toward non-Western, non-Christian peoples was typical of many British officials in the late Victorian era. Convinced of the innate superiority of Western civilization, Cromer believed that "Orientals" could never improve their lot until they had mastered the ways of the West, and for this they required a long apprenticeship under the enlightened tutelage of "advanced" countries like Great Britain. He disparaged Egyptian demands for independence and assured his superiors in London that direct British guidance would be necessary for years to come.

Cromer's priorities were to restore Egypt's credit by meeting the debt payments and to maintain domestic tranquility by supporting the rule of Khedive Tawfiq and discouraging political agitation. Because he was opposed to the development of any local industrial base that might rattle the British textile industry, Cromer sought to increase Egypt's revenue by expanding its agricultural production. He authorized a massive effort to improve the Nile-based irrigation system through such projects as the construction of the Aswan Dam, completed in 1902; the rebuilding of the Delta Barrage; and the excavation of still more canals. In addition, Egypt went through another railway boom as its already extensive network of track was doubled. These improvements brought about a substantial rise in Egypt's agricultural output, especially cotton, which remained the main source of revenue. Indeed, during the Cromer years, Egypt became more dependent than ever before on the export of this single crop.

In terms of Egypt's international financial standing, Cromer's policies must be considered a success. By the mid-1880s, the budget showed a surplus, and there appeared to be no danger of defaulting on the debt payments, which during most of Cromer's period amounted to between 25 and 35 percent of annual government revenues. In addition, the British administration's concern with agricultural development brought with it a rise in the general standard of living in the countryside. Taxes were reduced, and such practices as forced labor and the use of the whip were abolished. Despite this progress, the needs of the Egyptian fellahin were still largely neglected. The Egyptians who benefited most from Cromer's investment in public works were the large landholders who saw their property values and profits grow. Although they may not have liked the British occupation as such, they came to have a vested interest in the social and economic advantages it brought them, and they would attempt to preserve those advantages even as they demanded British evacuation.

The British governed Egypt through a rather cumbersome arrangement that was often frustrating both to them and Egyptians alike. Because Egypt remained nominally an Ottoman province, the Egyptian governmental structure was retained, and Egyptian personnel continued to occupy their posts as ministers and civil servants. Over the years, this practice expanded the cadres of Egyptian officials who had experience in the state bureaucracy, though it cannot be said to have increased their experience in decision-making, for even if Egyptian officials had some latitude in day-to-day office management, they did not govern their own country. The British adviser attached to each ministry, in consultation with his British staff, determined policy, and Lord Cromer, with his control over the budget, determined funding priorities. By the turn of the century, hundreds of British officials, army officers, engineers, and teachers—many unqualified by either training or experience—dominated all areas of important decision making within Egypt. Their salaries, several times higher than those of their Egyptian counterparts, were paid by the Egyptian rather than the British government, and their air of cultural superiority, emphasized by their memberships in exclusive British sporting clubs, contributed to growing tensions with the Egyptian educated classes, who believed they were qualified to govern their own country.

Although Cromer's programs were designed primarily to serve British imperial and financial interests, they brought certain material advantages to Egyptians. However, in many areas of social development, his policies were regressive. This was particularly true in education, where he reversed the trend toward a state-supported school system that had been such a pronounced feature of Isma'il's reign. The reasons behind Cromer's restrictive educational policies were financial and political. During his first years in office, Egypt's uncertain financial situation and Cromer's predilection for investment in revenue-enhancing public works projects led him to reduce the budget for education. Many of the specialized postsecondary institutions founded by Isma'il were closed, and enrollments in the government primary and secondary schools declined. Even after Egypt's finances improved, Cromer provided only limited funding to the Department of Public Instruction. Moreover, whereas Isma'il's government school system had borne the costs of instruction, Cromer's administration introduced tuition fees at all levels, a measure that severely restricted the general public's access to state education. The political aspect of Cromer's educational policies was shaped by his experiences in India and led him to believe that the growth of Western-style educational institutions, especially universities, would create a group of Egyptian intellectuals imbued with nationalist ideals and a sense of frustration over their inferior status. Accordingly, the consul general attempted to confine the Westernized schools to the training of future civil servants and to direct the bulk of primary school graduates into vocational institutes.

One of the factors that prolonged the British occupation and generated tension between Cromer and the Egyptian nationalists was the question of the Sudan. Isma'il had completed the conquest of the Sudan that was begun by Muhammad Ali and had strengthened the Egyptian military and administrative presence there. But when a figure calling himself the Mahdi (see Chapter 7) mounted a rebellion in the Sudan against the Egyptian occupation in 1881, his forces quickly overran the scattered Egyptian garrisons. Determined to hang onto the Sudan, the Egyptian government sent an ill-prepared expeditionary force into the Mahdi's territory in 1883; it was massacred. General Charles Gordon's relief force fared no better, and following Gordon's death at Khartoum in 1885, the Sudan was abandoned to the Mahdi and his successors for the next ten years. Neither Cromer nor the government in London wished to mount an expensive military campaign that would put a strain on both the Egyptian and the British treasuries.

As the scramble for territories in Africa heated up in the 1890s, however, the British cabinet reconsidered its position on the Sudan. When rumors of the presence of a French force in the southern Sudan reached London, the cabinet authorized a joint Anglo-Egyptian expedition under General Herbert Kitchener. Kitchener's difficult reconquest of the Sudan began in 1896, and it was not until 1898 that his forces were able to enter Khartoum and restore what the Egyptian government believed would be Egyptian control over the Sudan. But Cromer and the British government had other plans for the region. They had drawn up provisions for the creation of an Anglo-Egyptian condominium that would make Britain the effective ruling power in the Sudan. Even though Egyptian troops had participated in the reconquest and the Egyptian treasury had contributed over half the cost of Kitchener's campaign, Britain essentially separated the Sudan from Egypt and arranged for the territory to be administered by a British governor general. British prime minister Lord Salisbury told Cromer that Britain intended to have "a predominant voice in all matters connected with the Sudan" and expected the Egyptian government to follow any advice it might receive from London regarding Sudanese affairs.¹ Britain's action outraged Egyptian opinion, and demands for the restoration of Egypt's role in the Sudan remained a central plank in the nationalists' platform until 1955, when the Sudanese themselves voted to become independent rather than affiliate with Egypt.

The primary medium through which Egyptian opinion was expressed was the periodical press. In what may seem like a paradox, journalism flourished during the British occupation and assumed an increasingly important place in Egyptian political and cultural life. Although many of the leading journals of the Cromerera, from the daily newspapers al-Muqattam and al-Ahram (The Pyramids) to the monthly magazine al-Hilal (The Crescent), were founded by Syrian-Christian émigrés who came to Egypt to escape the harsh rule of Sultan Abdul Hamid II, they all addressed the question of Egypt's relationship with Britain. But the Egyptian press served a larger purpose than the presentation of political opinions; it was a forum for the propagation of ideas on the major cultural and social issues of the era. Islamic reformers and Christian secularists, supporters of parliamentary democracy and of khedival autocracy, advocates of Swiss educational methods and of the reform of al-Azhar all found an outlet for their views in the lively Egyptian periodical press. Educated Egypt had found a voice—or perhaps many voices—and its echoes reverberated across the political landscape.

Of the leading newspapers of the time, al-Liwa (The Standard), founded in 1900, probably best represented the rising current of Egyptian protest. It was published by Mustafa Kamil (1874–1908), whose education reflects the path to upward mobility chosen by other ambitious Egyptians of his generation. Kamil enrolled in the Cairo School of Law in 1889 and received his law degree from the University of Toulouse in France. A skillful political journalist and a spellbinding speaker, Kamil gained popularity through his demand for the immediate end of the British occupation. When Cromer and some members of the Egyptian landholding class responded to Kamil's attacks with arguments about the prosperity that British administration had brought to Egypt, Kamil retorted, “The chains of slavery are still chains, whether they be forged of gold or of iron.”² Though Kamil sometimes claimed that Egypt had Islamic bonds with the Ottoman Empire, he also began to move away from the concept of Egypt as part of a wider Islamic or Ottoman world. More clearly and more directly than his contemporaries, he articulated sentiments of Egyptian patriotism, arguing that Egypt was a unique territorial entity with its own special characteristics and urging its inhabitants to offer it their deepest affection. The following lines are representative of Kamil's patriotic message: “My country, to you my love and my heart, my life and existence. . . . For you, you are life, and there is no life without you, O Egypt.”³ Kamil was not a systematic thinker, but his writings and his oratory contributed significantly to the awakening of the political consciousness of the Egyptian public and to the emergence of the idea of territorial nationalism.

The Egyptian political atmosphere became more highly charged with the accommodating Tawfiq’s death and the accession of his eighteen-year-old son, Abbas II (1892–1914). Though schooled in Switzerland and Vienna, Abbas II was an Egyptian nationalist and aspired to be more than a mere figurehead ruler. He directly challenged Cromer’s authority and provided funds for anti-British newspapers like Kamil’s al-Liwa. To the mix of a vocal press and an independent-minded ruler was added a severe international recession in 1907–1911 that drove the price of cotton down and caused severe hardship in the Egyptian countryside. The Dinshaway incident of June 1906 was the spark that ignited the flame of anti-British feeling. It is always dangerous for the historian to single out a specific event as the start of a larger movement, but Dinshaway, coming as it did at a time of economic recession and political discontent, seemed to galvanize Egyptian opinion.

The event was simple enough. Five British officers went pigeon shooting in the Delta village of Dinshaway, which, like countless other Egyptian villages, raised pigeons for meat and eggs. In the course of pursuing their sport, the officers managed to wound the wife of the village prayer leader and to set fire to a threshing floor. The villagers protested, and in the altercation that followed, two British officers were wounded, one of whom later died. Because of the political and economic tensions that existed at the time, the British authorities were determined to punish the inhabitants of Dinshaway as an example to the rest of the country. A special tribunal was set up, and fifty-two of the villagers were charged with the unlikely crime of premeditated murder. Thirty-two were quickly convicted, and four of them were publicly hanged in Dinshaway. Several others received floggings, and the remainder were sentenced to prison at hard labor.

Egyptian reaction to the sentences was one of shock and outrage. The press, led by Kamil’s al-Liwa, denounced the verdict, and the peasants of the Egyptian Delta created folk ballads about the incident, one of which included the lines: “They fell upon Dinshaway / And spared neither man nor his brother. / Slowly they hanged the one and flogged the other.”⁴ Dinshaway created a certain common ground between the fellahin and the urban nationalists and demonstrated to both that Britain was not a benevolent protector but an alien occupier. The British show of force was a miscalculation that intensified Egyptian demands for an end to the occupation and hastened the departure of Lord Cromer, who submitted his resignation in 1907.

The Growth of Political Organizations, 1907–1914

Cromer’s successors, Sir Eldon Gorst (1907–1911) and Kitchener (1911–1914), addressed some of the immediate political and economic grievances that surfaced in the aftermath of the Dinshaway incident. Gorst achieved a conciliation of sorts with Khedive Abbas and opened up more high-ranking administrative posts to Egyptians. Kitchener sought to restore Egyptian confidence in Britain by reviving the public works program and legislating the Five Feddan Law (1912), which was supposed to protect small landholders by prohibiting the seizure of properties of five feddans or less for debt (1 feddan equals 1.04 acres, or .416 hectare, abbreviated ha). But neither of these consul generals could stem the growth of Egyptian opposition to the British presence.

This opposition was expressed through three main organizations, all of them founded in 1907. They consisted of groups of Egyptian thinkers and activists associated with a particular vision of their country’s future that they promulgated in various widely circulated newspapers. The opinions of the groups’ leaders reveal the broad range of social perspectives that had developed among the Egyptian elite. The Constitutional Reform Party, grouped around Shaykh Ali Yusuf (1863–1913), an al-Azhar graduate, and his newspaper, al-Muayyad, advocated Egyptian independence within an Islamic framework. Such well-known Islamic reformers as Muhammad Abduh and Rashid Rida contributed to the columns of al-Muayyad (see Chapter 7). At the other end of the political and cultural spectrum was the People’s Party. Its leading spokesman was Lutfi al-Sayyid (1872–1963), a graduate of the Cairo School of Law and editor of the paper al-Jaridah. The People's Party introduced a tone of secular liberalism into the debate on Egypt's future, and though it advocated independence, it stressed a more cautious approach and reminded Egyptians that they must demonstrate their worthiness for self-government. The third grouping, the National Party, was led by Mustafa Kamil and regarded al-Liwa as its official organ. Kamil, as mentioned above, demanded immediate British evacuation and argued that Egypt was a distinct territorial entity to which its inhabitants owed their devotion. The public debate on these important issues was abruptly terminated with the outbreak of World War I; Britain declared Egypt a protectorate, imposed martial law on the country, and deposed Abbas II in favor of his more malleable uncle, Husayn Kamil.

IRAN DURING THE SECOND HALF OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY

European influences came to Iran later than they did to Egypt and the Ottoman Empire and had far less impact there than in those two states. In part this was because powerful forces of decentralization had taken root in Iran during the chaotic period between the fall of the Safavids in 1722 and the consolidation of the Qajar dynasty in 1794 (see Chapter 3). Unlike Muhammad Ali and Mahmud II, the Qajar shahs were never able to gather together sufficient resources to destroy or even to limit to any measurable degree the centrifugal elements within society.

Changes in Iranian Shi‘ism After the Safavids

One of the primary factors militating against the centralization of state authority in Iran was the prominent and independent position that the Shi‘a religious establishment had achieved within Iranian society. As noted in Chapter 3, the Safavid shahs were accepted as the divinely inspired representatives of the Hidden Imam. Their recognized religious authority assisted them in legitimizing their temporal power. However, with the fall of the Safavids and the emergence in the late eighteenth century of the Qajar shahs, who made no claims to divinity, the question of the right to exercise religious authority in the absence of the Hidden Imam was reopened. The Shi‘a ulama maintained that because the Qajars were merely temporal rulers, the ulama had the exclusive right to provide interpretations on issues of law and religious practice. They established their claim to be the legitimate interpreters of the will of the Hidden Imam by assuming the right to exercise ijtihad (see Chapter 2).

What this meant in practice was that those members of the religious establishment whose piety and depth of learning were deemed by their peers to be superior were empowered to render judgments on matters of law and religious practice; they were, in short, entitled to recognition as mujtahids, learned individuals qualified to exercise ijtihad. In the late eighteenth century, there were never more than three or four mujtahids at any given time. This changed during the first half of the nineteenth century, when the religious establishment won popular acceptance of two concepts: first, that all believing Shi‘a Muslims should attach themselves to a mujtahid and accept his rulings as valid on matters of religious observance and legal practice and, second, that the rulings of living mujtahids were preferable to all other existing rulings. The acceptance of these principles generated a need for an increase in the ranks of recognized mujtahids. With the proliferation of mujtahids, an informal hierarchy emerged that recognized certain mujtahids as possessing such high qualities of learning and understanding that their rulings should take precedence over those of their contemporaries. These individuals bore the title marja al-taqlid, the source of emulation, and were the dominant figures within the Shi‘a religious establishment. During the twentieth century, it became customary to refer to an individual who had achieved the status of a marja al-taqlid by the term ayatollah, the eye of God.

With the fall of the Safavid dynasty and the rise to power of rulers who had no divine attributes, the previously close association between Shi‘a Islam and the state ended, and the Shi‘a religious establishment functioned independently of the government. Backed by a population who granted them extensive authority in religious and legal matters, the ulama could function as a powerful force of support or opposition to the shahs’ policies. By the time of the Qajar dynasty, popular belief held that the mujtahids’ rulings were more authoritative statements of the will of the Hidden Imam than the proclamations of the shahs. Thus, if a mujtahid denounced a royal decree as incompatible with the teachings of Islam, then believers were enjoined to accept the mujtahid's decision. In this way, the ulama gained a powerful voice in Iranian political life.

The Reign of Nasir al-Din Shah (1848–1896)

The Qajar shahs established their court at Tehran and surrounded themselves with the pomp and ceremony associated with the long-standing Iranian monarchical tradition. Although individual rulers lived in great personal luxury, the appearance they gave of firmly established royal authority was deceiving. On several occasions during the nineteenth century, the Qajar shahs controlled little beyond the gates of Tehran. They have been described during this period as “having no military security, no administrative stability and little ideological legitimacy.”⁵ These limitations are illustrated in the long reign of Nasir al-Din Shah (1848–1896). When he assumed the throne, the standing army of the state was pitifully small, numbering as few as 3,000 troops. Real military power rested with the tribal chieftains, who often commanded more armed men than the shah. Because the military forces of the state were so weak, Nasir al-Din had to depend on tribal levies. When he was unable to pay them, which was often, the tribal armies disbanded. Given these circumstances, the tribal chieftains enjoyed a considerable degree of political and financial autonomy. Because the state could not destroy them, as Muhammad Ali had the Mamluks or Mahmud II the Janissaries and the derebeys, it resorted to manipulating rivalries among them in order to survive. In these circumstances, the government's tax-collecting abilities were severely limited, and Nasir al-Din's treasury was chronically short of funds.

Early in his reign, Nasir al-Din did undertake a modest program of military reform, increasing the size of the standing army, introducing new training procedures, and changing the pattern of recruitment. But these measures were hesitant and foundered on the shah's inability to pay the new recruits. The only lasting improvement in the armed forces during Nasir al-Din's reign was the creation of the Cossack Brigade in 1879. Commanded by Russian officers and supplied with Russian arms, the Cossack Brigade was the most effective military arm of the government. However, it remained small (2,000 to 3,000 mounted men), and its control by Russian officers had obvious disadvantages. Iran, then, did not engage in a sustained program of European-inspired military reform, with all the offshoots this produced in Egypt and the Ottoman Empire.

Nor, in the realm of administration, did the role of the government appreciably expand to create a demand for the recruitment of a cadre of civil servants trained for new tasks. The offspring of the royal family and the semiautonomous local chieftains received most of the choice provincial governorships, a practice that discouraged the rise of a professional bureaucracy with defined duties and written codes of conduct. A further obstacle to the emergence of administrative professionalism was Nasir al-Din's habit of replenishing his treasury by selling offices and tax-farming privileges to the highest bidders on an annual basis; the successful buyers, knowing their tenure in office was likely to be short, sought to recover their costs and to make a profit by whatever means they could. Bribery and extortion were commonplace. The most obvious victims of these abuses were the peasant classes, who were subjected to arbitrary acts on the part of local chieftains and government officials alike. Large landlords, encouraged by the absence of any government regulations, seized small peasant holdings and reduced their inhabitants to laborers. Although it may be true that the peasantry has traditionally resented centralizing governments for their conscription and tax-collecting efficiency, it is also the case that effective regimes have afforded rural society a measure of security and stability. In the Iran of Nasir al-Din, the government came to be resented not only for its inability to provide protection from regional exploiters but also for the rapacious practices of those few official government representatives who did manage to exercise authority in the rural areas.

Nasir al-Din did make an initial but hesitant attempt to improve both his bureaucracy and his officer corps by opening a new institution of higher learning, Dar al-Funun (1851). Staffed by Europeans and offering instruction in European languages and applied sciences, Dar al-Funun stood alone as the only state-sponsored school of its kind. Although some of its graduates pursued further education in Europe and obtained positions in the bureaucracy and the military, the institution did not have an immediate impact on the conduct of Iranian statecraft. Its enrollments fluctuated widely, depending on the level of the shah's personal and financial support. One visitor in the early 1870s counted only about seventy students and one European instructor, figures much lower than they had been when the school first opened. In part, the failure of the school to create a critical mass of well-placed, reform-minded bureaucrats and military officers was due to the presence of the Qajar princes and tribal dignitaries in the most important government posts; hence, training at Dar al-Funun did not become an established route to status and power. In the absence of any other state-sponsored institutions, the ulama dominated all levels of education.

The influence of the Shi'a ulama was not confined to the field of education. As we have seen above, during the eighteenth century, the power of the religious establishment increased vis-à-vis the authority of the temporal government. Throughout the nineteenth century, the ulama successfully asserted their right to intervene with religious interpretations of political acts. They also kept their grip on the educational and judicial reins of society; no new elite emerged to replace them in the school system, and there were no major secular challenges to the shari'ah or to the ulama's role in the administration of justice. In contrast to the changing attitudes in Cairo and Istanbul, in Qajar Iran, it was still considered a sign of greater status to be admitted to the ranks of the ulama than it was to become a member of the civil service.⁶

The religious establishment's ability to maintain its independence from the central government was based to a large extent on its financial autonomy. Nasir al-Din could barely collect enough taxes to keep his small administration running, whereas the ulama amassed considerable wealth. In Shi'a Islam the temporal government was not allowed to collect the zakat, the charitable donation Muslims must pay; instead, the ulama received the zakat. A major source of revenue, the funds were used to sustain the members of the religious establishment, to operate madrasahs and support the students attending them, and to provide social assistance to the underprivileged. In addition to zakat taxes, the ulama received income from teaching, administering waqfs, registering deeds and titles, and maintaining mutually advantageous ties with urban merchants. The Shi'a religious outlook, so dominant in Iran, enabled the ulama of Nasir al-Din's time to deepen their influence over the population at large and to appear as the protectors of the people from a government that was increasingly viewed as corrupt and impious.

Iran Between Russia and Britain

The lack of direct state initiative in introducing European-style reforms did not mean Iran had escaped Western influences. Both Russia and Britain regarded the country to be of the utmost strategic importance, and their repeated interference in Iranian affairs contributed to the administrative paralysis of Nasir al-Din's regime. During the first half of the nineteenth century, Russia occupied territories traditionally claimed by Iran in Turkestan and in the Caucasus region along the Caspian Sea, including portions of the important province of Azerbaijan. By absorbing Turkestan, Tajikistan, and the lands of the Caucasus into the Russian empire, the czars assumed the difficult task of ruling over an ethnically diverse population of Christians and Sunni and Shi'a Muslims. Russian expansionism in Iran had commercial as well as territorial objectives. Following a decisive military victory over the shah's irregular tribal forces in 1828, Russia imposed the Treaty of Turkomanchai on Iran. The treaty included clauses granting Russian merchants extraterritorial rights and favorable tariff rates similar to the privileges accorded Western Europeans in the Ottoman Capitulations.

In the opinion of British policymakers, the Russian advances in Iran posed a threat to India's security and offered unwelcome competition to British industry's search for overseas markets. The commercial challenge was met by a treaty signed in 1857 in which the shah granted British merchants the same low-tariff advantages and extraterritorial privileges previously accorded Russians. As happened in the Ottoman Empire and Egypt, the capitulatory agreements opened the way for the economic penetration of Iran and drew that country into the European-dominated global economy. Although the volume of Iran's international commercial exchange was much less than that of Egypt and the Ottoman Empire, the country's economic transformation followed a pattern similar to theirs. Iran exported raw agricultural commodities—cotton, silk, wheat—and imported manufactured goods—primarily textiles and hardwares—from Britain and Russia. Iran's traditional textile industry declined in the face of competition from cheap foreign imports. However, one area of production, carpet making, did prosper from Iran's economic opening. As Persian carpets became popular in the West, production was increased to meet the new demand.

Britain's alarm over Russia's territorial advances toward the borders of India led the British to inform St. Petersburg that they would not stand by if Iran were dismembered. Because neither power wanted war over Iran, they tacitly agreed to allow the country to exist as a buffer state between their strategic interests, an arrangement similar to the one made in the case of the Ottoman Empire. Still, both imperial powers continued to compete for influence over the Iranian government. Russian policy aimed at keeping Iran weak and undeveloped, whereas Britain encouraged economic improvements that might strengthen the country and enable it to resist Russian encroachment. Nasir al-Din Shah, caught in the middle of this rivalry, sought to play the two powers off one another through the use of the only leverage he had: the granting of economic concessions. This device was also a way for Nasir al-Din to acquire much-needed cash with which to finance his taste for imported luxury goods and his expensive trips to Russia and Western Europe.

In 1863, the shah awarded the concession to build a telegraph line to a British company and later tried to counterbalance this by giving other concessions to Russian subjects. The shah's court was soon besieged by European concession hunters, the most successful of whom was Baron Julius de Reuter, a British subject. In 1872, Nasir al-Din awarded Reuter a concession that was quite possibly the largest ever negotiated. Reuter won the exclusive right to construct all railways, canals, and dams in Iran as well as extensive privileges in mining and agricultural development. The shah, desperate for funds, surrendered the economic development of his country in exchange for a relatively modest initial fee and future royalties. Objections to the concession, both within Iran and from the Russian government, were so strong that Nasir al-Din was compelled to cancel it in 1873. Russia and Britain continued to compete for economic concessions from the shah, especially over the rights for railway construction. Their pressure and counter-pressure so stalemated any activity in this area that by 1900 Iran had less than twenty miles (thirty-two kilometers) of functioning railway.

The Tobacco Protest of 1891

The corruption and inefficiency of Nasir al-Din's government, combined with its policy of opening Iran to foreign economic exploitation, created a current of popular unrest that finally broke into open revolt. In 1890, the shah granted an English company the exclusive right to produce, sell, and export Iran's entire tobacco crop. This affected a product widely consumed and marketed by Iranians, and it brought all the elements of discontent together in a series of mass protests against the concession and the ruler who had granted it. Significantly, members of the Shi'a ulama organized and led the protest. They urged the population to join them in preserving the dignity of Islam in the face of growing foreign influences; they portrayed the shah's concession policy as a transgression of the laws of Islam and used their independent power base to denounce the government. In 1891, a Shiraz mujtahid issued a decree declaring the use of tobacco unlawful until such time as the concession was canceled. The decree was framed in the context of Twelver Shi'ism and warned that the use of tobacco in any form was an offense to the Hidden Imam. The mujtahid thus employed his power of interpretation to counteract a policy of the central government. The Iranian people, already alienated by the shah's accommodation of European economic interests, followed the mujtahid's ruling by engaging in a statewide boycott of tobacco products. Several huge demonstrations against the concession were held in Tehran and other major cities. Unable to enforce his will on a public who had rallied behind its religious leaders, the shah canceled the concession in 1892. For the ulama, the experience of the tobacco protest showed that the Iranian people were receptive to calls for political activity based on Islamic frames of reference.

The last years of Nasir al-Din's rule were notably unproductive. The protest against his use of concessions was a financial handicap as well as a personal humiliation, and he found it necessary to contract loans from Russia to keep the state afloat. Iran thus joined Egypt and the Ottoman Empire as a debtor state. During this final period of his long reign, the shah became openly hostile to contact with the West, prohibiting the establishment of new schools and preventing Iranians from traveling to Europe. The isolationism of Nasir al-Din's regime is encapsulated in his boast that he preferred to appoint ministers who did not know whether Brussels was a place or a cabbage.⁷ His assassination in 1896 was not a cause for widespread grief.

CONCLUSION

Throughout the second half of the nineteenth century, the penetration of European capital and commerce into different parts of the region restructured the Middle Eastern economic order. The Capitulations, which originated as enticements to Western European merchants from a militarily dominant Ottoman Empire, were transformed into instruments of European economic and political control in the age of expansive European capitalism and dominant European military technology. In an effort to recover Middle Eastern military strength and thus to prevent both provincial rebellion and European imperial encroachment, the rulers of Egypt and the Ottoman Empire started to purchase European military technology and to fund European-style training facilities. But the expenditures associated with these endeavors exceeded the capacities of the two states' revenue-producing abilities, and they were forced to seek loans from European lenders. Eventually, the unfavorable economic environment of the Capitulations, which limited the revenue-raising opportunities of the two states, forced them into bankruptcy. In the case of the central Ottoman Empire, bankruptcy led to European control of the distribution of Ottoman revenues but not to European occupation of the Ottoman capital city. The rivalries inherent in the Eastern Question were too intense and the territory involved too strategic to permit one Great Power to dominate the empire at the expense of the others. Nor was the Ottoman Empire a passive state.

In the case of Egypt, however, Britain deemed its interests so important that it defied all potential European resistance and occupied the country in 1882. During Lord Cromer's long tenure as administrator of the occupation, he managed Egypt's economic, political, and social development so as to further British, not Egyptian, interests. Cromer's primary concern was financial stability, and although he presided over an impressive expansion of the Egyptian economy, he ensured that the economy remained geared to the export of raw materials for British industry. And in an effort to justify the continuing British presence in the country, Cromer insisted that Egyptians were unprepared for independence and sought to perpetuate this condition by limiting the educational opportunities available to them. Yet the British occupation itself fostered the growth of Egyptian nationalism, and by the eve of World War I, secular and religious leaders alike took up the call that had first been heard during the Urabi revolt: “Egypt for the Egyptians.”

Although Iran shared certain historical trends with Egypt and the Ottoman Empire, it diverged from them in others. In the realm of economic development, for example, Iran, like the other regions, was drawn into the global economy as an exporter of raw materials. And the Qajar shahs granted capitulatory privileges and economic concessions to Britain and Russia, thus placing the transformation of Iran’s economy in the hands of foreigners. However, Iran did not experience the governmental centralization that was such an important precondition for the transformation of Egypt and the Ottoman Empire. European-inspired military reforms, which had been the original driving force behind the Ottoman and Egyptian transformations, were not carried out in Iran. Nor did Nasir al-Din Shah undertake a sustained effort to train a cadre of civil servants committed to the promulgation of European-style institutions. In the absence of royal determination and trained personnel, Iran did not experience an era comparable to the Ottoman Tanzimat or Egypt’s intense Westernization during the reign of Isma‘il.

Moreover, in Egypt and the Ottoman Empire, the expanding functions of the central state reduced the role of intermediaries between the government and the population. For example, Muhammad Ali’s seizure of waqfs, Mahmud II’s creation of a Ministry of Religious Endowments, and Isma‘il’s establishment of the Mixed Courts all contributed to the reduction of the ulamas’ revenue and influence. By contrast, the shahs of Iran lacked the power to successfully confront such intermediary groups. The powerful and independent Shi‘a religious establishment continued to possess greater influence among the population than did the shahs. The Tobacco Protest of 1891 serves as a dramatic example of the clergy’s ability to emerge victorious in a power struggle with the monarch. The combination of a decentralized government and a potent religious organization caused Iran to take a different course in its interaction with Europe and European ideas than did the Ottomans or Egyptians.

THE RESPONSE OF ISLAMIC SOCIETY

By the end of the nineteenth century, nearly all of the major political units of Islam, from Indonesia to northern Nigeria, were under some form of European control. Those that had escaped direct occupation—Iran, the Ottoman Empire, Afghanistan, and Morocco—found their sovereignty restricted by European control of their economies. The domination of Islamic lands by the states of Western Europe posed a terrible dilemma for Muslims. Why did the divinely ordained Islamic community suffer such defeats at the hands of the infidels? The general Muslim consensus was that the divine message revealed to the Prophet remained valid. It was not Islam that was flawed; rather, the flaw lay with Muslims themselves and their failure to follow the commands of God. In this view, the abandonment of the shari‘ah for secular constitutions and man-made legal codes was symptomatic of the errors of the Western-educated elite, whose eager embrace of alien institutions not only had failed to save society but had also hastened its ruin. But the French knowers were not the only targets of criticism. Muslim intellectuals and political activists argued that Islamic practices had become degenerate and had deviated from the true path as set forth in the revelations.

In this atmosphere of self-criticism, a current of reaction against the adoption of European ways accompanied a reassertion of Islamic values. Especially prominent in Egypt was a movement of intellectual inquiry that sought to rediscover the essential principles of Islam and to explain their application to the changing world of the twentieth century.

RELIGIOUS ASSERTIVENESS AND AUTHORITARIAN REFORM: THE ERA OF ABDUL HAMID II

Abdul Hamid II (1876–1909) was the last Ottoman sultan to exercise unrestrained royal authority. Within two years of coming to power, he suspended the constitution he had pledged to uphold and shifted control of the machinery of government from the bureaucrats back to the royal palace in order to enforce his autocracy. His reign of thirty-three years, the third longest in the history of the Ottoman dynasty, began with a cautious mixture of reform and conservatism but ended in an oppressive reaction against European institutions and ideas. The sultan used the vastly expanded powers of the central government to impose restrictions on Ottoman subjects' political and intellectual activity. The reaction against the wholesale adoption of Western-inspired reforms was symbolized by Abdul Hamid's stress on the Islamic heritage of the Ottoman Empire. In contrast to the secularism of the Tanzimat, he surrounded himself with the trappings of the caliphate and catered to the religious establishment.

Abdul Hamid also downplayed Ottomanism, with its acceptance of the equality of all religions, and adopted in its place the doctrine of Pan-Islam. This doctrine was closely linked to Abdul Hamid's emphasis on his position as caliph and his claim to be the protector of Muslims throughout the world. The idea of a revived Islamic ummah under the rule of a single caliph had little likelihood of being realized, but Abdul Hamid's exploitation of the concept enhanced his status and drew further attention to the possibilities of casting off European domination through a renewal of Islamic solidarity. Pan-Islam also served as a useful instrument of diplomacy in the sultan's dealings with Britain, France, and Russia. If he could convince the European imperial powers that he possessed a measure of authority over the millions of Muslims in their colonies, he would gain leverage in negotiations with them. From a domestic standpoint, Abdul Hamid's stress on Islamic ties was intended to secure the continued loyalty of the Arab inhabitants of the empire. Many of the leading Muslim Arab notable families enjoyed increased prestige and easier access to important administrative posts during Abdul Hamid's reign, and certain privileged Arab ulama became part of his palace entourage. The crowning material symbol of Pan-Islam was the Hijaz railway from Damascus to Medina, opened in 1908. Constructed to facilitate the annual pilgrimage, it was financed by private subscriptions from Muslims throughout the world and was thus free from the taint of European investment capital.

Despite its outward display of anti-Westernism and traditional religiosity, the first decade of Abdul Hamid's reign witnessed an acceleration of certain Tanzimat programs, most notably in the field of education.¹ The sultan and his bureaucrats undertook an extensive program of state-sponsored educational expansion in order to counter the spread of foreign influences generally and the success of Christian missionary schools in enrolling Ottoman subjects in particular. The emphasis was on the secondary school system, which had been underdeveloped during the Tanzimat period. As an example of the magnitude of this educational project, the Ottoman state constructed fifty-one new secondary schools in the years from 1882 to 1894, mainly in the Asian provinces. The curriculum, designed and administered by state officials, employed European pedagogical techniques to teach modern sciences while at the same time inculcating students with the principles of Islamic morality, Ottoman identity, and loyalty to the sultan. In short, the Ottoman state adopted a Western-style system of education and underpinned it with indoctrination in core Ottoman values. The entire system was highly centralized, and the sultan's agents closely monitored the schools and their instructors. The scope and direction of this educational project demonstrates an element of activism during the Hamidian era and shows that the sultan's goal was more to Ottomanize modern secondary education than it was to restore the pre-Tanzimat system. Further evidence of advances in modern education is seen in the opening of the University of Istanbul in 1900.

In addition, the Hamidian era witnessed a rapid development of the empire's communications and transportation systems. Istanbul was linked to Vienna by rail in 1883, and soon thereafter the renowned Orient Express began to offer regular service from Paris. Other lines brought the cities and towns of Ottoman Europe and Anatolia into closer contact with Istanbul, and an extensive telegraph network reached out to the most distant parts of the empire. These improvements tightened the central government's control over the hinterlands.

One of the significant results of the transportation boom was a strengthening of ties between Germany and the Ottomans. In 1882, the German general Colmar von der Goltz was employed as head of a mission to reorganize the armed forces, continuing a long-standing tradition of Prussian involvement in Ottoman military modernization. During the Hamidian era, German investment capital played a leading role in the construction of railways, most notably in the development of the Berlin-to-Baghdad line across Anatolia, a project that caused Britain such unease that it became as much a diplomatic issue as an engineering challenge. The German-Ottoman connection was made closer by Kaiser Wilhelm II's two state visits, in 1889 and 1898, and by his much-publicized declaration during the latter occasion that Germany was the friend of the world's 300 million Muslims.

Notwithstanding the improvements in education and transportation, the reign of Abdul Hamid had its dark side. The insecure sultan, haunted by memories of his predecessor's deposition and convinced of the dangers of constitutionalism, tried to impose total control over the information available to his subjects and the activities in which they could engage. The press was tightly censored, the school curricula were subjected to close scrutiny, and the public discussion of politics was forbidden. An internal network of government spies and informants, aided by the new telegraph system, infiltrated all levels of the administration; its reports led to the imprisonment and exile, often on the most dubious evidence, of many loyal Ottoman officials and intellectuals. Others escaped the tyranny by voluntary exile or immigration. Away from the reach of Abdul Hamid's police in Paris and Berlin, they formed protest groups and published pamphlets, which were smuggled into Istanbul, denouncing the sultan and his autocracy. And the institutes of higher learning, which Abdul Hamid tried so desperately to control, became breeding grounds of discontent as students and teachers alike chafed at the censors' clumsy restrictions.

The ruthless suppression of national separation movements also marked Abdul Hamid's regime. The harshest measures were directed against the Armenian community. In the opinion of the sultan and his advisers, the loss of territory in the Balkans was bad enough, but the creation of an independent Armenian Christian state in the heartland of Anatolia was unthinkable. When confronted with a series of Armenian nationalist activities in the 1890s, the sultan struck back with a vengeance. The brutal Ottoman response to Armenian nationalist agitation did not distinguish between political militants and the Armenian population at large. In the rural areas of Anatolia, Abdul Hamid unleashed Kurdish irregulars against Armenian villages, and many innocent people were massacred. In Istanbul the state security apparatus harassed and intimidated respectable merchants and clergymen. In 1897, Abdul Hamid used such ferocity to crush an uprising against Ottoman rule in Crete that Greece declared war on the empire. Although the Ottomans easily won the military contest, they lost the diplomatic one; intervention by the European powers forced the sultan to accept the autonomy of Crete, confirming the already suspicious ruler's distrust of the West.

During the final years of his reign, Abdul Hamid became increasingly isolated in the royal palace. His Pan-Islamic policy was not unpopular with the Muslim subjects of the empire, but the graduates of the very schools he had founded came to see the sultan as an impediment to progress, and the movement that would overthrow him began to form within the officer corps and the exile communities in Europe.

ISLAMIC PURITANISM ON THE TRIBAL FRONTIERS: THE WAHHABI, SANUSI, AND MAHDIYYAH MOVEMENTS

European expansionism was not the only inspiration for Islamic revivalism. During the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, an increase in doctrinally based Islamic movements occurred among the rural populations in various Islamic regions. The leaders of these movements often were men educated in the classic Islamic tradition who came to believe that the infiltration of decadent popular practices was causing Islamic society to deviate from the tradition of the Prophet. The rural movements they launched for the purification of the faith helped spread the conviction that Islamic society would have to look within itself for the sources of its own regeneration. The three movements to be examined here were by no means the only ones of their kind; they were, however, among the most influential and the most enduring.

A scholar from central Arabia, Muhammad ibn Abd al-Wahhab (1703–1792), set the theological foundations of the Wahhabi movement. Educated in the holy cities of Mecca and Medina, Abd al-Wahhab set forth, in writings and preaching, an uncompromising affirmation of tawhid, the oneness of God. In this regard he labeled Sufism, with its veneration of saints, as a form of polytheism and branded its practitioners as apostates and thus deserving of death. There was a distinct fundamentalist orientation to Abd al-Wahhab's thought, especially in his insistence that the Quran and the hadith were the only reliable sources through which the divine will could be comprehended. Yet coupled with his fundamentalism was an innovative quality that led him to denounce the practice of unthinking adherence to scholars' interpretations and the blind acceptance of practices that were passed on within the family or tribe. He believed in the individual Muslim's responsibility to learn and obey the divine commands as they were revealed in the Quran and the hadith.

Abd al-Wahhab's preaching attracted the support of a local chieftain from Najd, Muhammad ibn Sa‘ud. Ibn Sa‘ud's warriors and Abd al-Wahhab's reformist message merged into a powerful politico-religious force that expanded throughout northern Arabia and succeeded in capturing Mecca in 1803. It was at this point that the Ottoman sultan requested Muhammad Ali to send his Egyptian troops to Arabia to destroy the movement. Although the power of the Wahhabi forces was broken, Abd al-Wahhab's reformist ideals became ingrained among the tribes of Arabia. The Wahhabi example of self-generated purification had a profound impact in Islamic circles at the time and later became influential among twentieth-century reformers, who adopted many of its principles.

The Sanusi order, which had its base in Cyrenaica (now eastern Libya), was more within the tradition of Sufism than was the Wahhabi movement. Its founder, Muhammad ibn Ali al-Sanusi (1787–1859), was an Algerian who spent several years studying and teaching in Mecca. His views were unpopular there, and he eventually settled in Jaghbub in Cyrenaica, a tribal region that lacked any center of political authority. The aim of al-Sanusi and the order he founded was to recreate the original community of the Prophet. The order rejected the Ottoman and Egyptian forms of Islamic behavior in favor of a more austere desert life. Although the doctrines of the Sanusi brotherhood may not have been as intellectually venturesome or as rigorously puritanical as those of Abd al-Wahhab, al-Sanusi's political achievement was noteworthy. Al-Sanusi and his followers had remarkable success in integrating the surrounding tribes into his religious order and establishing a comprehensive network of brotherhoods and trading posts stretching from northern Cyrenaica into the Sudan. The order survived its founder's death and, as the only organized unit in the region, took part in the struggle against European imperialism. The Sanusis opposed French expansion in Central Africa and resisted the Italian invasion of Tripoli in 1911. The order had its ups and downs during the various phases of Italian rule in Libya, but when the victorious Allied powers were looking for a ruler for the new state of Libya in 1950, they settled on al-Sayyid Muhammad Idris, the head of the Sanusi brotherhood and the grandson of its founder. The Sanusi order thus became the basis for the contemporary Libyan state.

The Mahdiyyah uprising in northern Sudan has been previously mentioned in the context of Anglo-Egyptian relations (see Chapter 6). Here our concern is with the movement as another example of revived Islamic political activity. The Mahdist revolt was both a rebellion against the Egyptian occupation of the Sudan and a movement for the purification of Islam. Egyptian rule was neither popular nor effective. It had been established by a brutal conquest and could be maintained only by stationing thousands of Egyptian troops in the country. Taxes were much higher and more forcefully collected than had been the case previously, and the administrators sent to the Sudan were often corrupt. By the late 1870s, Sudanese discontent with the corruption and the oppressive taxation of the Egyptian administration had reached a breaking point. It was this discontent that Muhammad Ahmad channeled so masterfully into a mass movement of protest and purification.

Muhammad Ahmad (1844–1885), a Sudanese, received a traditional religious education and had established a reputation for asceticism and piety that had gained him a modest popular following. In 1881, he proclaimed himself the Mahdi, the expected one, and to the degree that his followers accepted this claim, he was regarded as directly inspired by God. His goal was to revive the faith and practice of the Prophet through the restoration of the Quran and the hadith as the foundations of a just society. He made a virtue of the poverty of the Sudan by renouncing worldly goods and citing the relative luxury of the Egyptian governors as evidence of their impious behavior. He formed an administrative unit, soon to become a full-fledged state, modeled closely on the Prophet's practice in Medina. The Mahdi introduced a military dimension to his movement by declaring a jihad against the Egyptian administration, claiming that only by dislodging these lax Muslims from the Sudan could a true Islamic society be established. With remarkable speed, the Mahdi attracted a large and devoted following and conquered most of the northern Sudan, including Khartoum, which his forces captured in 1885.

The Mahdist state survived under his successor (known, significantly, as the caliph) until Kitchener's reconquest of the Sudan in 1898. Although the movement spanned less than twenty years, its legacy continues to be a factor in Sudanese politics. During the Mahdi's lifetime, his rebellion attracted considerable attention throughout the Islamic world. His stunning successes in routing the Anglo-Egyptian army and establishing an indigenous Islamic state offered hope to Muslims everywhere that Islamic revival could serve as the weapon to drive out European imperialism.

THE REFORM OF HIGH ISLAM

The growing concern for the continued survival of the Islamic ummah in a world increasingly dominated by Europe also found expression in the urban milieu of high Islam. Here, as in the tribal response, the emphasis was on the need for Muslims to acquire a proper understanding of the original principles of Islam so as to recover the spirit of solidarity and piety that had brought such triumph to the Prophet and his successors. Although some members of the ulama used this period of reevaluation to recommend the rejection of all Western innovations, the most original of the new thinkers recognized the importance of accommodating European achievements in science and technology within the framework of Islam. Theirs was the most difficult task of all: reasserting the universal applicability of the faith while at the same time incorporating ideas that originated outside the revelations.

The activist political dimension of Islamic revival was embodied in the person of Jamal al-Din al-Afghani (1839–1897), who has been described “as a man whose life touched and deeply affected the whole Islamic world in the last quarter of the nineteenth century.”² Al-Afghani’s pronounced influence on Islamic opinion was due less to the originality of his theological formulations than to the appeal of his call for direct action in the name of Islamic solidarity. He was a complex individual, but at one basic level, he may be characterized as an itinerant anti-imperial activist blessed with exceptional personal magnetism. Raised and educated in Iran, he took up residence in Egypt in 1871 and attracted a group of young men to his ideas of political and religious reform. His activities were unwelcome to Khedive Tawfiq, who ordered him deported to India in 1879. Al-Afghani resurfaced in Paris in 1884; he and one of his disciples, Muhammad Abduh, published an Arabic newspaper, al-Urwah al-Wuthqa (The Indissoluble Bond), that emphasized the importance of religiously based political solidarity. Later al-Afghani became an adviser to Nasir al-Din Shah in Iran, but when the shah granted the tobacco concession of 1890, al-Afghani became one of the leading organizers of the mass protests against it. He was expelled from Iran, but his influence in opposition circles remained strong; Nasir al-Din’s assassin was one of al-Afghani’s former students. He spent the last five years of his life in Istanbul as a guest of Sultan Abdul Hamid, who was attracted by his Pan-Islamic message but so appalled by his politics that he kept the famous visitor under virtual house arrest.

The purpose in all these wanderings and in the writings in al-Urwah al-Wuthqa was to arouse in Muslims a determination to overcome their weaknesses. The Christian West was currently dominant not because it was superior but because Islam had fallen into a state of decadence and stagnation. For al-Afghani, Islam was in accord with the scientific spirit and the demands of human reason, but Muslims had become ignorant of the true principles of their faith. They had to take it upon themselves to rediscover these principles and to discard the superstitions that had corrupted the community. Unity and action were central to al-Afghani’s conception of Islam. It was the unity of the ummah that had brought such greatness to Islamic civilization in the past. Despite the existence of different races and languages among Muslims, al-Afghani believed that Pan-Islamic sentiment was the most powerful force for bringing the community together. Muslims should use their feelings of communal solidarity to resist European exploitation and to revive their sense of common purpose. However, this revival could be achieved only by effort; it would not come as a gift from God. Al-Afghani deplored all forms of passivity, but he was especially critical of Muslim rulers who allowed European armies to invade their territories and permitted European concession hunters to control their economies. He called for their overthrow and for the return of political authority to pious and uncorrupted leaders. It was al-Afghani's encouragement of action, the sense he conveyed that the status quo could be changed, that generated such appeal among young Muslims of his era. His memory as the first widely publicized figure to explain how a reformed Islamic community could stand as a bulwark against Western subversion of the values of the Middle East has remained inspirational to the present day.

Al-Afghani's most famous disciple, Muhammad Abduh, pursued what al-Afghani had sought to accomplish through political agitation, but Abduh took the more measured steps of intellectual inquiry and institutional reform. Abduh (1849–1905) is one of the most intensely studied Arab Muslim thinkers of the modern era. Born in an Egyptian village, he went on to become a student and then a teacher at al-Azhar in Cairo. During his student days, he met al-Afghani and became a devoted member of his circle. After al-Afghani's expulsion from Egypt, Abduh became active in the Urabi movement and was exiled in 1882. He was abroad for six years, mostly in Beirut but also in Paris. Upon his return to British-occupied Egypt, he served for a time as a judge and then was appointed mufti of Egypt in 1899. As the chief Islamic official in the country, he initiated reforms in the shari'ah court system and tried with little success to introduce changes in the organization and curriculum of al-Azhar. A dignified and respected man, Abduh was as inspirational in his quiet way as the more charismatic al-Afghani. His numerous disciples came to occupy prominent positions in the Egyptian political and religious establishment, and his far-reaching proposals for the reformulation of Islamic doctrine generated a debate among the Muslim clergy and laity that has lasted from his time to ours.

Abduh's proposals, contained in his major scholarly work, Risalah al-Tawhid (A Treatise on the Oneness of God), and in his decrees as mufti, represented his response to the challenge posed by Europe's success. His purpose was to demonstrate that Islam was compatible with modernity and that an educated Muslim did not have to choose between being modern and being Muslim; the two went hand in hand. In broad summary, Abduh attempted to reconcile the unquestioning obedience demanded by divine revelation with the freedom of independent human reasoning. Like Abd al-Wahhab and al-Afghani, he saw that local superstitions and administrative practices dating from earlier centuries had become accepted as integral parts of Islamic doctrine and were robbing the ummah of its intellectual vigor and social dynamism. Abduh believed that the eternally valid requirements of Islam were found in the Quran and the verified hadith and had been most rigorously observed during the period of the Rashidun caliphs, the four immediate successors of the prophet. Thus, the reformist tendency associated with Abduh's name, the Salafiyyah movement, stems from the Arabic word for ancestor, salaf, and is tied to Abduh's contention that the study of the early community provided the surest guide to divinely approved behavior. Practices that had been incorporated into the community since the time of the Rashidun, ranging from political theory to judicial organization, were the products of human reason and were designed to meet specific historical circumstances. It followed that human reason could modify such practices to meet new circumstances; they were not part of the eternally valid revelation. In Islamic theological terms, Abduh was calling for the reopening of the gate of ijtihad, the application of informed human reason to new situations (see Chapter 2).

If, after the passage of more than a century, Abduh's proposals seem somewhat contrived and conservative, we must attempt to appreciate how bold they were at the time. Abduh was both a preservationist and a reformer. He could accept, for example, Muhammad Ali's administrative reforms, and he was a strong advocate of broadening the curricula of the Islamic educational institutions. Change did not frighten Abduh. But the thought that some Muslims and Europeans might conceive of change as possible only outside the framework of Islam did concern him. Thus he sought to demonstrate that positive change was not the preserve of the Christian West but was also permissible, even encouraged, in a properly understood interpretation of Islam. In this way, he managed both to constrain and to open the receptivity of Islamic society to new ideas and practices. The new had to be measured against the standards of the Quran, the hadith, and the practice of the Rashidun; if it was acceptable on those grounds, then it could be applied on the basis of informed human reason. Abduh's disciples took his thought to extremes in both areas: Some considered him the founder of a rigid school of interpretation, and others regarded him as the sponsor of the unbounded application of human reason.

EMERGING CURRENTS OF ARAB CULTURAL DISTINCTIVENESS

Within the Ottoman domains, Abdul Hamid's stress on his role as caliph was a recognition of the importance of Islam as the primary bond between the Arabs and the Ottoman state. The subject peoples of the Balkans had more readily discovered their national distinctiveness because they were also religiously distinct. But for Arab Muslims, the ties of the ummah were paramount, and the Ottoman state represented these ties. As long as loyalty to the empire appeared to be consistent with loyalty to the best interests of Islam, most Arab Muslims accepted the legitimacy of Ottoman rule. However, when a Syrian reformer, Abd al-Rahman al-Kawakibi, suggested that the Ottomans were responsible for the corruption of Islam, he introduced a nationalist argument that had profound implications for the Ottoman-Islamic order in the Arab provinces.

Al-Kawakibi (1854–1902) was from a distinguished family in Aleppo. His career as a journalist and a municipal administrator in his native city brought him into frequent conflict with Abdul Hamid's censors, and in 1899, he finally emigrated to Egypt, where he became a prominent figure in the intellectual circles of Cairo. In his two published works, Tabaci al-Istibdad (The Nature of Despotism) and Umm al-Qura (The Mother of Cities: Mecca), he analyzed the causes for the degeneration of Islam and offered suggestions for its regeneration. Both books contained extensive criticism of Abdul Hamid's oppressive rule.

At its most basic, al-Kawakibi's defense of Islamic civilization was a glorification of the Arab role in the development of that civilization. The virtues of Islam—its language, its Prophet, its early moral and political order—were Arab achievements. In his view, practices the Turks and other non-Arab peoples had introduced into the ummah caused the decadence of Islam, and he went so far as to express regret that the Turks had ever embraced the faith. The Arabs were the true protectors of Islam, and al-Kawakibi called for the Ottomans to relinquish their unjustified claim to the caliphate and to restore the office to its rightful possessors, the Arabs. In his opinion, the regeneration of Islam would begin with the establishment of an Arab caliph in Mecca whose responsibilities would be confined to purely religious matters. Al-Kawakibi was not an Arab nationalist, but in suggesting that the Arab version of Islam was the only pure one, he provided an ideological opening through which Arabs, as Muslims, could oppose Ottoman rule.

Muslims did not, of course, constitute the only Arab grouping within the empire. Large Christian minority communities were present in Syria and Mount Lebanon. How did they respond to the new currents of Islamic reformism, and what role did they see for themselves in a state that increasingly emphasized its Islamic heritage? During the second half of the nineteenth century, the Arab Christians of Syria and Lebanon experienced an economic and literary renaissance that is known as al-nahdah, the awakening. This resurgence also affected the Arab Muslims of the region, but its greatest impact was on members of the Christian communities. The main catalysts for the awakening were foreign Christian missionary activity and the printing press.

Beginning at the time of the Egyptian occupation of Syria (1831–1840), activity by US Protestant, French Catholic, and Russian Orthodox missionaries increased dramatically. The original missionary impulse to convert the local Christians to mainstream Western versions of the faith quickly shifted to a concern for lay education and to a heated competition, especially between Presbyterians and Jesuits, to enroll members of the local Christian communities in their schools. This competition had fortunate side effects: By 1860, the Presbyterians had founded thirty-three schools in Beirut, Jerusalem, and the villages of Lebanon. This was capped in 1866 by the opening in Beirut of the US-sponsored Syrian Protestant College (later the American University of Beirut), an institution that was to produce a glittering list of alumni in the fields of politics, medicine, and literature. The Jesuits were equally industrious, founding schools in Beirut, Damascus, and Aleppo as well as in the villages. The Reverend Daniel Bliss, the founding president of the Syrian Protestant College, was keenly aware of the competition between the Protestant and Catholic missions and is reported to have claimed during the ceremonies marking the opening of the Syrian Protestant College that he was, in effect, establishing two universities. His prediction came true nine years later when the Jesuits opened the Université St. Joseph in Beirut. In addition to their concern with establishing schools, the US and Jesuit missions imported Arabic printing presses, which they used to produce textbooks and religious materials. In time, these presses published new editions of classical Arabic texts and served as the inspiration for the development of a lively journalistic tradition.

Throughout Lebanon and parts of Syria, this extensive educational effort, conducted largely in the Arabic language, contributed to an Arabic cultural renaissance. There was a revived interest in the classical literary tradition as well as much experimentation with new forms and styles. The career of Butrus al-Bustani (1819–1883) exemplifies the Arab cultural awakening. Born a Lebanese Maronite Christian, al-Bustani was so favorably impressed by his early contacts with American missionaries that he converted to Protestantism. He taught for a time in the missionary schools and, in 1863, founded his own institution, the National School, which taught Arabic and contemporary scientific subjects. Al-Bustani's prodigious literary effort included the compilation of an Arabic dictionary, the founding and editing of several periodicals, and, in collaboration with his sons, the production of eleven volumes of an Arabic encyclopedia. His objective was to spread knowledge and appreciation of the Arabic language, and the cumulative impact of his life and work "contributed to the creation of modern Arabic expository prose, of a language true to its past in grammar and idiom, but made capable of expressing simply, precisely, and directly the concepts of modern thought."³ Al-Bustani also encouraged a receptiveness to the scientific discoveries made in Europe, believing that only through a willingness to acquire modern knowledge would the Middle East recover its proper place in the world.

The influence of al-Bustani and others who shared his enthusiasm for blending the Arabic cultural heritage with contemporary political and scientific thought generated a lively intellectual atmosphere among the growing numbers of educated Arabs concentrated in Beirut. During the 1860s and 1870s, literary clubs and scientific societies became active in that city and served as centers for the discussion of political as well as literary topics. The emphasis on the Arabic language that was at the heart of the nahdah led naturally to a heightened awareness of the cultural identity of the Arab community. This was especially marked among the Christian Arabs, the principal beneficiaries of the foreign educational missions. Because of their Christianity, members of this community did not regard the new ideas and institutions coming from Europe as a threat to the foundations of their civilization; they did not have to go through the elaborate intellectual exercises of the Muslim reformers in order to justify change and the acceptance of Western concepts of political and social organization. The success of Europe was an affirmation of the local Christians' faith, and to important segments of them, European intervention and protection offered a tempting route of escape from their minority status under Ottoman rule. Ties between France and the Maronite Christians of Lebanon were especially close.

The reign of Abdul Hamid brought into ever-sharper focus the question of the future of Christians in the Ottoman Empire. However, the Hamidian regime's political repressiveness also affected Muslim Arabs, especially that group of journalists, intellectuals, and nascent politicians who had managed to partake of the educational opportunities offered during the nahdah. The Beirut literary societies became increasingly multisectarian and began to discuss such subjects as the shared heritage of the Arabs and the notion that solidarity among Arabic speakers had a greater claim on communal loyalty than did religious ties. The idea of patriotism, of the love of a particular territorial entity as an element of social cohesion, also became current. Christian Arabs, as members of a restricted minority community, had a special interest in promoting the concept of equality based on nonsectarian considerations, but the appeal of a shared sentiment of Arabness also attracted Muslims. This current of cultural renewal was by no means a nationalist independence movement, nor did it eliminate deeply rooted feelings of sectarian identity. But it did serve to increase the Arab community's awareness of its distinctiveness and historical achievements. As such, the Arab awakening represented the addition of yet another challenge to the Ottoman system.

CONCLUSION

By the turn of the twentieth century, the once-solid Ottoman-Islamic Middle Eastern order was rendered unstable by the variety of responses emanating from its core components to the challenge of European dominance. There was a growing awareness that the Islamic community had to find within its own traditions the means for regeneration or else face the loss of those traditions. At the center, the Pan-Islamic caliphal autocracy of Sultan Abdul Hamid II generated support from those elements of Ottoman society that had been disadvantaged by the Tanzimat and was endorsed, at least in its Pan-Islamic political dimensions, by Jamal al-Din al-Afghani. In British-occupied Egypt, growing feelings of national distinctiveness and demands for political independence mingled with the country's long-standing role in the Islamic cultural universe as represented by the reformist ideas of Muhammad Abduh. On the tribal frontier, the currents set in motion by the Wahhabi, Sanusi, Mahdiyyah, and other similar movements continued to create waves of unrest against both local corruption and European encroachment and to offer appealing programs of Islamic-based activism as solutions to the problems besetting the ummah. And in the Arab center, the nahdah generated a vibrant Christian Arab movement of cultural solidarity that also attracted Muslim Arabs and reawakened memories of the central Arab role in the creation of one of history's major civilizations. The Young Turk conspirators who overthrew Abdul Hamid in 1909 attempted to impose a single solution on these diverse trends; in so doing they set them in conflict with one another and unintentionally brought an end to the Ottoman system in the Middle East.

CHAPTER 8

THE ERA OF THE YOUNG TURKS AND THE IRANIAN CONSTITUTIONALISTS

The Young Turk era from 1908 to the Ottoman defeat in 1918 saw all the trends of the preceding century meet in a head-on collision. Adding to the turmoil were proposals for new forms of cultural and political identification that clashed with the dominant ideology of Ottomanism. The situation in Iran was equally turbulent as that country experienced revolution, civil war, and foreign occupation.

Events within the Middle East unfolded against the backdrop of a changing international order that contained elements of promise—and of danger—for the Middle East. A promising component of the new order was Japan’s emergence as a modern military power. In barely fifty years, Japan was transformed from a decentralized feudal society to a unified, technologically advanced nation, having acquired the institutions that appeared to lie at the core of European success—a constitution (1889) and a modern military machine. Japan’s new status was affirmed by its decisive victory over Russia in the war of 1904–1905, a victory widely celebrated as a triumph of Asia over Europe. The example of Japan was a source of both envy and inspiration to reform-minded Middle East activists. To many of them, Japan stood as a symbol of what was possible—indeed, of what was necessary—if European dominance was to be resisted.

For Ottoman and Iranian leaders, changing configurations within the European alliance system highlighted the urgency of military reform. Germany's growing strength and Britain's reaction to that development were the primary causes of these changes. Germany was a member of the Triple Alliance, a system completed by Bismarck in 1882. The alliance joined Austria-Hungary and Italy with Germany in a mutual defense pact that lasted until World War I. France responded to the Triple Alliance by allying with Russia in 1894. Britain preferred to avoid the entanglements of continental alliances, but increasing industrial and naval competition from Germany forced the British to reconsider their policy of isolation. As a result, Britain entered into an informal agreement with France, the Entente Cordiale (1904), in which the two powers resolved the overseas disputes that had kept them at loggerheads for more than twenty years. By the terms of the agreement, France recognized Britain's occupation of Egypt and the British acknowledged France's preeminent position in Morocco. This dual alliance was expanded into the Triple Entente in 1907 when Britain and Russia reconciled their long-standing differences in Asia. The Anglo-Russian accord was reached at the expense of Iran. The two powers agreed to reduce their competition for influence in Iran by recognizing mutual spheres of influence in the country: Russia would be dominant in the north and Britain in the southeast. The independent center was to be neutral. However, the two Great Powers did not hesitate to violate that neutrality when it served their interests.

The relative speed with which Britain and Russia agreed to partition Iran presented an ominous threat to the Ottomans. Throughout the nineteenth century, the rivalries among the Great Powers had served to restrain any one of them from occupying large portions of Ottoman territory. But the formation of the Triple Entente raised the specter of Great Power cooperation in dismembering the empire. The Ottoman leaders responded in two ways: They reemphasized military reform in the hope that they, like the Japanese, could ward off Europe by developing more effective European-style armed forces, and they strengthened the empire's economic, military, and diplomatic ties with Germany, a potential ally in any confrontation with the Triple Entente.

THE REVOLT OF 1908 AND THE YOUNG TURKS IN POWER

The movement that became known as the Young Turks was an amalgam of three separate protest groups—one an exile community of long standing, the second a collection of discontented civil servants and students, and the third a coalition of disaffected army officers stationed in Ottoman Europe.

From the time of the Young Ottomans, an active Ottoman exile community existed in Paris and Geneva. This community grew during Abdul Hamid's reign and, in the 1890s, attempted to influence Ottoman political life directly. The exiles' program consisted of demands for the restoration of the constitution of 1876 and a condemnation of Abdul Hamid's tyrannical regime. In 1902 a member of the Ottoman royal family organized a congress of Ottoman liberals in Paris that repeated the demand for a constitutional regime. However, these patriotic, European-oriented exiles had no power base and were frequently divided among themselves. Their major contribution to the rise of anti-Hamidian sentiment was to revive the idea of a constitution as a means to curb royal autocracy and preserve the territorial integrity of the Ottoman Empire by restoring the principle of Ottomanism.

Within the empire itself, students in the military-medical academy founded a secret protest society in 1889. Known as the Committee of Union and Progress (CUP), it soon attracted other students and some civil servants. In common with the exiles, the participants in the CUP were largely the products of European-style schools and viewed the Hamidian repression as an impediment to essential reforms. Convinced of the urgency of restoring a constitutional regime, they endeavored to establish cell groups to further their program. However, in 1895 and 1896, Abdul Hamid's spies uncovered the movement and arrested and exiled its members. Although a clandestine opposition survived, it had little chance of developing, as the sultan widened his security operations and introduced new measures of censorship.

Abdul Hamid's nearly paranoid distrust of organized institutions extended to the armed forces. During the last years of his reign, the quality of military equipment deteriorated, and salaries were allowed to decline and to fall into arrears. Disaffection spread among line officers, some of whom formed secret protest groups that became linked to the CUP. Opposition to Abdul Hamid was especially pronounced among officers of the Ottoman Third Army stationed in Salonika. Educated in European-style military institutions, these men were loyal to the empire and its proud military tradition and confident that their training had prepared them to carry on that tradition. They believed that Abdul Hamid's attitude toward the army was undermining its strength and reducing its abilities to defend Ottoman territory in Europe. This patriotism, firmly grounded in Ottomanism, led a group of officers from the Third Army to stage a revolt in summer 1908 and to demand that Abdul Hamid restore the constitution; they warned that if the sultan did not act, they would march on Istanbul and restore the constitution themselves.

Choosing not to challenge the power of an uprising within his armed forces, the sultan accepted the demand from Salonika, and on July 24, 1908, the constitution was declared once again in effect. Abdul Hamid's gesture temporarily restored his popularity, and there was a general rallying behind the sentiments of Ottoman solidarity and political liberty. Elections to the new parliament were held in fall 1908, and by the year's end, representatives from all areas of the empire gathered in Istanbul, where Abdul Hamid formally convened the chamber of deputies that he had dissolved thirty years earlier. But not everyone shared the enthusiasm for European political institutions. In spring 1909, a counterrevolution broke out against the new government. It was led by common soldiers and theological students in Istanbul who voiced their resentment against the influence of the Europeanized army officers by chanting slogans calling for the restoration of the shari'ah. This time the Third Army acted directly. Styling itself "the army of deliverance," it marched on Istanbul, put down the disturbances, and gave its support to the parliamentary government. Abdul Hamid was accused of fomenting the counterrevolution, and the chamber decided to remove him from office.

The way in which the sultan was deposed reveals the crosscurrents of opinion swirling through the Ottoman Empire at this crucial moment. To satisfy the Muslim sentiments Abdul Hamid had so skillfully exploited, the traditional method of deposition was followed, the shaykh al-Islam issuing a formal decree declaring that the sultan was deposed. However, in order to give voice to the spirit of Ottomanism and political liberty that had inspired the events of 1908–1909, a four-member parliamentary delegation, including an Armenian and a Jewish representative, was sent to inform Abdul Hamid of his removal from office. He was exiled to Salonika, the birthplace of the revolution, and replaced as sultan by his younger brother, Mehmet V (1909–1918), who was little more than a figurehead.

The first phase of the Young Turk period, from 1909 to 1913, witnessed a power struggle between the CUP, with its base of junior and middle-level army officers and civil servants, and shifting coalitions of liberals and conservatives who had little in common but their opposition to the CUP. Through the manipulation of parliamentary elections and sheer ruthlessness, the CUP gradually gained full control of the government. By 1913, it consolidated its rule as a virtual military dictatorship under the triumvirate of Enver, Talat, and Jamal Pashas. Each of these three men was talented, patriotic, and ambitious; each was also deeply flawed, and together they led the Ottoman Empire to its final dissolution. Enver (1881–1922) and Jamal (1872–1922) embodied the opportunities for social mobility made possible by the new educational institutions; both were from modest origins, both attended the war college in Istanbul, and both became staff officers in the Third Army in Salonika. Talat Pasha (1874–1921), the most competent of the triumvirate, followed a career in the new civilian communications branch of the empire. He rose from a poor family to assume a position in the post and telegraph service in Salonika, and, in 1917, he became grand vizier of the Ottoman Empire.

Although the CUP became increasingly oppressive after 1913, it was at heart a reformist movement, and its first years were marked by an intellectual freedom unparalleled in Ottoman history. With the lifting of Abdul Hamid's censorship, the periodical press resurged in the empire's major cities of the empire. It was an exhilarating period, as ideas so long denied public expression poured forth in an exuberant torrent. The government, when not distracted by war and the struggle to stay in power, concentrated on expanding primary and secondary education and improving the military, which had been neglected during Abdul Hamid's last years. As pragmatic reformers, the CUP leaders believed that the population would respond favorably to more efficient government. This conviction led them to attack the bloated bureaucracy, pensioning off incompetent officials and reducing the personnel on the state payroll. Although the logic behind this policy may have been sound, its implementation alienated many members of the civil service and several Arab notable families whose members had occupied posts in the provincial administration on an almost hereditary basis. This was typical of the kind of mistakes the inexperienced CUP leaders made; they were usually well intentioned, but their policies often offended key groupings within Ottoman society.

Ideology and Politics: The Debate on Identity

Abdul Hamid's deposition accelerated the public debate over the political and cultural loyalties of the peoples of the Ottoman Empire. At one level, the debate focused on achieving the proper mix between European and indigenous ideas and institutions. At another level, it concerned the troubling issue of national identity. Individuals often found themselves torn between the alternatives that surfaced during the stimulating but perplexing years before World War I.

When the Young Turks seized power in 1909, they were determined to save the Ottoman Empire. However, to pursue this objective, they had to decide what the essential character of the empire was to be. Was it principally an Ottoman state committed to transformation and equal rights for all its ethnically diverse inhabitants? Or was it an Islamic state dependent for its survival on the rediscovery of properly interpreted Islamic traditions? Or, finally, given the composition of its political and military leadership, was it really a Turkish state to which certain minority nationalities were attached?

The CUP leaders were committed to the concept of Ottomanism. Much like the Young Ottomans forty years earlier, they believed the best way to restore the empire's vitality was through constitutional government that would limit the power of the monarch and guarantee the rights of non-Muslims by incorporating them into the framework of Ottomanism. One of the government's first acts after the deposition of Abdul Hamid was to abolish the millet system, thereby stressing its commitment to Ottomanism and to the ideal of preserving all Ottoman territory. At the same time, however, the regime could not abandon the Islamic foundation on which imperial legitimacy had rested for so many centuries. Thus, the CUP continued to stress the role of the sultan as caliph and to use Islamic symbols to buttress its own claims to legitimacy. In this, as in other aspects of its rule, the CUP was caught on the horns of a dilemma. In order for the ideal of Ottomanism to be realized, the religious distinctions between Muslim rulers and non-Muslim subjects had to be abolished in substance as well as in theory. It was also necessary to eliminate the factors that encouraged national separation movements within the empire and for the international community to respect the territorial integrity of the Ottoman Empire. None of these conditions came close to being fulfilled.

Shortly after the restoration of the constitution in 1908, Bulgaria proclaimed its final independence, Austria annexed the province of Bosnia, and Crete declared union with the Greek mainland. The Italian invasion of the North African province of Tripoli in October 1911 showed further contempt for Ottoman sovereignty. The Ottoman government sent reinforcements to support the Sanusi resistance in Tripoli, but pressures from other crises prevented Istanbul from offering serious opposition to the Italians; in October 1912, the Ottomans signed a treaty ceding Tripoli and some of the Dodecanese Islands, including Rhodes, to Italy. This eventful year also witnessed devastating Ottoman setbacks in Europe, as Albania proclaimed its independence and an alliance consisting of Bulgaria, Serbia, Greece, and Montenegro drove the Ottoman forces out of most of Europe during the First Balkan War. In spring 1913, the Balkan allies quarreled over the division of the territories they had taken, allowing the Ottomans to regain portions of Thrace. Yet this final victory was hollow, considering that in 1912, Ottoman domains in Europe had totaled 65,350 square miles (169,910 square kilometers) inhabited by an estimated 6.1 million people, but when the last Balkan War treaty was signed in September 1913, Ottoman Europe had shrunk to 10,882 square miles (28,293 square kilometers) and a population of 1.9 million.¹ These losses were not only staggering but also damaging to the CUP, which had committed to preserving the empire and instead presided over the loss of the heartlands on which the gazi state was founded. Adding insult to injury was the humiliation of the Ottoman military by the armies of the small states inhabited by former subject peoples.

The events of 1908–1913 called into question the policy of Ottomanism. They demonstrated once again that neither the Great Powers nor the Balkan successor states were willing to respect the territorial integrity of the Ottoman state, they showed that minority people preferred national affiliations to Ottoman citizenship, and they undermined the proposition that Muslims and Christians could share in a common Ottoman bond. The CUP leaders were far from perfect, but they faced almost insurmountable odds in their patriotic goal of preserving the imperial domains.

Although the upheavals did not prompt the CUP to abandon its policy of Ottomanism, they did generate a new awareness of the importance of the Anatolian Turkish core to the identity of the empire. The empire had been made much more homogeneous by the loss of 80 percent of its European domains, and it was natural that in the wake of the Arab nahdah and the Balkan nationalist movements, a specifically Turkish cultural movement would also emerge. The movement can be broken down into two main, often overlapping currents. The first current, Pan-Turkism, originated among Muslim Turkish exiles from Russia, several of whom achieved prominence in Istanbul intellectual circles at the turn of the century. Pan-Turkism stressed the existence of unifying bonds among all speakers of Turkish. To advocates of Pan-Turkism, the Ottoman Turks were just one branch of the several Turkish-speaking peoples who inhabited a vast expanse of territory from Anatolia to China. Even if they spoke different dialects, they shared the same basic language and therefore constituted a single and distinctive people. And as one people, they should have their own state made up of all the Turkish speakers in Anatolia, Russia, Iran, Afghanistan, and China. The grandiose political program of the Pan-Turkists may have stimulated Ottoman Turkish intellectuals to rediscover their own Turkish past, but it did not attract sustained support.

More appealing to the Turks of the empire was the doctrine of Turkism, which focused more directly on the Ottoman situation. The doctrine stressed the crucial Turkish contribution to the success of the Ottoman Empire and posited the notion that there was a special pre-Islamic, pre-Ottoman cultural heritage that distinguished the Turks from the other inhabitants of the empire. In a marked departure from Ottomanism, the writer Mehmet Emin published a poem in 1897 that began, “I am a Turk, my religion and my race are noble.”² Although Emin’s statement contained an element of ethnic distinctiveness, it still equated Turkishness with Islam.

The formation of a Turkish cultural club in Istanbul in 1912 and its association with the journal Türk Yurdu (Turkish Homeland) aided the transformation of the once-pejorative word Turk into a positive force of cultural identity. Significantly, the leading spokesman of this trend, Ziya Gökalp (1876–1924), was born and raised in eastern Anatolia. A member of the CUP inner circle, Gökalp argued that Turkish national traditions, what he called the soul of the nation, had become submerged under the cultural practices of the people over whom the Turks ruled. His self-proclaimed mission was to rediscover this soul by examining the history of the pre-Islamic Turks and by studying popular culture, which he believed had held fast to authentic Turkish traditions. For Gökalp, language was the essence of nationality, and he disdained the hybrid Ottoman language in favor of a modified Turkish vernacular that he claimed more accurately reflected the original Turkish soul. In seeking a place for Islam as a component of Turkism, Gökalp argued that the Turks had borne the burden of Islamic greatness for centuries and that a reformed Islam was an essential part of the Turkish nation. The combination of nationalism, Islamism, and modernism that circulated among the Ottoman elite during the Young Turk era is captured in Gökalp's statement, "We belong to the Turkish nation, the Muslim religious community and the European civilization."³ During the prewar years, the doctrine of Turkism did not develop into a coherent ideology defining a specifically Turkish national state. However, the discussions of a Turkish cultural heritage as distinct from the Ottoman one sowed the seeds for a full-blown Turkish nationalist movement in the postwar era.

The CUP and the Arab Provinces

The CUP's policies toward the Arab-speaking provinces were determined by the regime's quest for political security and centralized administrative control. Like any government with a questionable claim to legitimacy, the CUP sought to purge the administration of officials from the old order and replace them with appointees loyal to and dependent upon the Young Turk regime. Those who suffered most from this practice were the long-established Arab notable families. For example, the wealthy al-Abid family was represented in Abdul Hamid's palace entourage, in the central Ottoman government, and in the local Syrian administration. The CUP dismissed the al-Abids from their posts, confiscated some of their lands, and pushed them into self-imposed exile in Paris. Another distinguished Damascus family, the al-Azms, thrived politically and financially under Abdul Hamid. An al-Azm representative sat on the provincial and municipal councils of Damascus, and in the 1890s, two members of the family served as ministers in the Ottoman cabinet in Istanbul. The CUP replaced the al-Azms with loyal supporters of the new regime.

By denying the Arab notable families their traditional access to the government, the CUP undermined the notables' ability to satisfy their local clients and upset the established social and political order in the Arab provinces. Increasingly, the Arab elite perceived the CUP as a Turkifying government. Turks dominated the party leadership, and many of the officials appointed to replace Arabs in the provincial administrations were also Turks. Although the CUP's intention was to centralize the government, not necessarily to Turkify it, CUP policies caused important segments of the Arab population to become disaffected from the regime. Frustrated at their exclusion from power and angered at seeing their carefully laid plans for advancement within the Ottoman system destroyed by young army officers who failed to appreciate the advantages of mutual cooperation, some in the Arab elite began to contemplate alternatives to the CUP's brand of Ottomanism.

Although Arab grievances did not coalesce into an organized political movement for national independence, they did take on the coloring of Arabism, a proto-nationalist outlook that served both political and cultural purposes. On the one hand, Arabism was a means through which the Arab notable families could protest the CUP's attacks on their political and economic status; on the other hand, it represented an affirmation of Arab cultural identity and a desire for the government to give greater recognition to that identity. Arabism manifested itself in the formation of various literary clubs, reform societies, and clandestine organizations among Arabs in Istanbul and throughout the Arab provinces. The twin strands of political protest and cultural affirmation became intermingled in the programs of these societies, which called for the recognition of Arabic as an official language, the appointment of Arabs to administrative posts within the Arab territories, and greater political autonomy for all the Arab provinces. These demands show that the proponents of Arabism were fully prepared to accept Ottoman rule, but they wanted it to be decentralized. Their grievances were directed against the CUP regime that had deprived them of their proper role within the Ottoman order, not against the Ottoman state.

The largest of the Arab organizations formed during the Young Turk era was the Party of Ottoman Administrative Decentralization. Founded in early 1913 and headquartered in Cairo, the party established branches in most of Greater Syria's Arab cities. Its president was Rafiq al-Azm, a member of the Damascus family mentioned earlier, and Syrian urban notables dominated its agenda. The party's name suggests that its membership was willing to reach an accommodation within the framework of Ottomanism but that any such accommodation had to provide scope for the notables' return to their former status. The discontented Arab elite's willingness to find commonality with Ottomanism is evident in the resolutions passed by the Arab Paris Congress of 1913. Organized jointly by the Decentralization Party and a society of Arab students in Paris, the congress is often regarded as the starting point of Arab nationalism. Although the congress certainly provided a forum for the expression of Arab discontent, the tone of its resolutions was strongly Ottomanist, not separatist. The delegates expressed a desire for reforms and decentralization but stressed that they did not wish to separate from the Ottoman Empire.

Though moderate, the Paris Congress did prompt CUP leaders to realize that they must take steps to satisfy the demands of the most important non-Turkish Muslims within the empire. The government appointed an Arab, Sa‘id Halim, as grand vizier (1913–1917) and adopted other conciliatory measures that turned out to be more superficial than substantive. Among them was the appointment of the president of the Paris Congress and four other Arab notables to the Ottoman senate. These gestures were accompanied by a determined—and successful—CUP effort to co-opt leading Arab dissidents by securing their appointments to provincial administrative posts. Thus, by World War I, the voice of Arabism had been muffled if not stilled.

The CUP was able to quell Arabism with such ease because so few advocated it. It is important to recognize that from 1908 to 1918, the vast majority of Arabs in the empire supported Ottomanism. Deeply ingrained loyalty to the Ottoman state and perceptions of the sultan-caliph as protector of the Islamic ummah were the chief elements of this support. Too often, the years from the Young Turk revolt to the outbreak of World War I have been viewed from the postwar perspective, which portrays the period simply as the gestation phase of Arab nationalism or as the preparation for the end of a doomed empire and the rise of separate nation-states in the Middle East. But the historian must reconstruct an era as it was for those who lived through it, and for most in the Arab elite, the Young Turk era was a time to plan for a future within the political framework of the Ottoman Empire. Despite the CUP's campaign against certain Arab notables whose prestige stemmed from their service in the Hamidian regime, many distinguished Arab families retained their power, and others acquired new standing under the Unionist regime. Thus, during the Young Turk era, Arabs continued to attend the advanced academies in Istanbul and to occupy high-ranking civilian and military positions.

Sati al-Husri and Shakib Arslan represent the diversity of Arab beliefs that the framework of Ottomanism could accommodate. Al-Husri (1880–1968) was the epitome of the Europeanized professional. Upon graduating from the civil service college in 1900, he was posted to the Balkans as a schoolteacher and later as a district administrator. An avid reformist and constitutionalist, al-Husri engaged in CUP activities before 1908 and was one of the young professionals who rose to prominence as a result of the CUP triumph. Following the deposition of Abdul Hamid, his work in Istanbul as teacher, director of the teacher training college, and editor of journals on educational reform gained him the reputation as the founder of modern Turkish pedagogy. Al-Husri was a Syrian Arab, but he was also a cosmopolitan member of the Ottoman elite, and his successful career rested on service to the Ottoman state. He had a vested interest in the preservation of that state, a goal he pursued through educational reform and the spread of the idea of Ottoman patriotism.

At the other end of the spectrum of Arab Ottomanism was Amir Shakib Arslan (1869–1946). A Druze prince from a powerful family in Lebanon, Arslan was influenced by the ideas of al-Afghani and Abduh and became a strong supporter of the Pan-Islamic policy of Abdul Hamid. As a journalist, poet, and local political figure, Arslan advocated the proposition that the survival of the Ottoman Empire was the only guarantee against the division of the ummah and its occupation by the European imperial powers. For him, Ottomanism and Islam were closely bound together, and the reform of Islam would naturally lead to the revival of the Ottoman Empire. Although he regretted the overthrow of Abdul Hamid, he accepted the CUP regime because of what he perceived as its commitment to preserving the empire's Islamic core. The CUP, in turn, recognized the advantages that the support of an established family like the Arslans could bring and rewarded them accordingly. Arslan was elected, with CUP backing, to the Ottoman parliament in 1914 and was later joined by two of his brothers. The Arslans saw that Ottomanism had its political benefits and represent an example of an Arab notable family that retained its status under the CUP regime.

Neither al-Husri, the secular professional educator, nor Arslan, the Pan-Islamic notable, believed that Arab separatism served his ideological goals or his personal interests. As a result, both supported Ottomanism, albeit of a somewhat different variety. For al-Husri, Ottomanism meant the adoption of European concepts of territorial patriotism, constitutional government, and secular citizenship; for Arslan, it meant the retention of the Islamic foundations of the Ottoman order and an emphasis on Islamic solidarity. Most of the Arab subjects of the empire accepted some form of Ottomanism, whether al-Husri's Europeanist version, Arslan's Islamic orientation, or a combination thereof. The demands of Arabism—political decentralization, cultural autonomy, and the replacement of the CUP regime—and the various options that existed within the dominant ideology of Ottomanism were all strands of the complex pattern of identity of the Arabic-speaking peoples. But for all the ideological turbulence and political restlessness of the period from 1908 to 1914, most Arabs—both the elite and the population at large—entered World War I committed to the Ottoman Empire's preservation.

THE PERIOD OF THE IRANIAN CONSTITUTIONAL REVOLUTION

The political upheavals from 1905 to 1911 mark a new phase in Iranian history. The era is generally referred to as the period of the constitutional revolution. As with the Young Turk revolt of 1908, the introduction of constitutional government in Iran was used as a weapon to attack royal autocracy. However, whereas the Ottoman constitutional movement had been founded on a transformed bureaucratic elite and a reform-oriented officer corps, the Iranian movement was led by an awkward coalition with contradictory ideas of what constitutional government would achieve. The coalition's three main components—traditional bazaar merchants, ulama, and a small group of radical reformers—were each convinced that if they could find a way to limit the shah's authority, they could guide the country in the direction they thought it ought to go.

The popular protests that culminated in the constitutional decree of 1906 targeted the policies of Muzzafir al-Din Shah (1896–1906), a weak and ineffective ruler. Facing the customary Qajar problem of how to generate enough income to keep the royal court in luxury, Muzzafir al-Din reintroduced the practice of concession granting. In 1901, the shah awarded a British subject, William D'Arcy, the concession for oil rights in the entire country except for five northern provinces. In exchange, the Iranian government was to receive 16 percent of the company's annual profits. This award proved to be a costly surrender of Iran's resources. Oil was discovered in commercial quantities in 1908, and in 1914, the British government became the major shareholder in the company holding the concession. Iran's vast oil reserves were placed at the disposal of Britain, and the preservation of British control over Iranian oil became a central factor in Britain's Middle Eastern policy. Muzzafir al-Din also had recourse to foreign loans, borrowing money from British, French, and Russian financial institutions. Rather than deploying the income from these loans in economic development or military improvements, Muzzafir al-Din used the funds to pay down earlier loans or squandered them on hugely expensive trips to Europe between 1900 and 1905. In reopening Iran to foreign economic penetration, Muzzafir al-Din made himself vulnerable to the same charges leveled at his father during the tobacco protest of 1891.

The renewal of foreign economic activities in Iran struck hardest at the bazaaris, the urban class of merchants, guild masters, and moneylenders that had traditionally been the hub around which most of Iran's economic life revolved. By granting foreigners favored customs rates in the import and export trade, the government made it impossible for local merchants to compete successfully. In addition, the import of low-cost manufactured items, especially textiles, destroyed the local craft industries. For the bazaaris, the shah's practice of selling Iran to foreign Christian economic interests not only offended their religious sensibilities but also threatened their economic survival.

A small but active circle of European-oriented reformers—including aristocrats, civil servants, army officers, and even some royal princes—was also instrumental in coordinating the protest against the shah. Their experiences of the West were diverse: Some had studied in Europe, others had witnessed the Ottoman reforms from Istanbul, and still others had learned about European institutions and ideas from translated books. What united them was their opposition to royal corruption and foreign exploitation; they believed that Iran was stagnating under the Qajars and that radical reforms were needed to shake the country from its doldrums and restore its position in the world. Motivated by sentiments of patriotism and liberalism, the reformers viewed constitutional government as a key ingredient for building a strong, progressive Iran.

The ulama's participation in the constitutional movement is more difficult to determine. Although the ulama were by no means united in their support for the movement, several leading mujtahids and large numbers of lesser ulama played a major part in the antigovernment demonstrations of 1906. The ulama were closely tied to the bazaaris, and it is likely that members of the religious establishment suffered financially from the influx of foreign business. In addition, Muzzafir al-Din's policies tended to reproduce the conditions that had sparked the protest of 1891, during which the ulama had accused the ruler of violating Islamic tenets. Finally, although Muzzafir al-Din was hardly a centralizer, the Shi'a religious establishment continued to guard its independence from the state and may have viewed the constitutional movement as an opportunity to guarantee that independence into the future. Hence, the important ulama role in the constitutional revolution was based not on demands for more reform and transformation but on demands for less. In the Ottoman Empire, the ulama generally opposed a constitution because they thought it would reduce their power; in Iran, the ulama supported one because they thought it would increase theirs.

The first phase of the constitutional revolution began with a large protest movement in Tehran in December 1905 and concluded in August 1906 when the shah, faced with huge antigovernment demonstrations led by the bazaaris, the ulama, and the reformers, capitulated to the crowds' demands and signed a decree convening a constituent assembly. The first assembly (Majlis) met in October 1906 and drafted two constitutional provisions that completely restructured the allocation of political authority within Iran. The first provision, the Fundamental Law, reduced the monarch's powers by giving the elected legislature final authority over loans, concessions, treaties, and budgets. Muzzafir al-Din signed the Fundamental Law a few days before his death. In the second provision, the Supplementary Fundamental Laws, Iranian citizens' rights were defined and the legislature was granted additional powers, including authority over the appointment and dismissal of ministers. But this had not been a secularizing constitutional movement. The ulama's triumph was ensured by constitutional clauses that stated that Twelver Shi‘ism was the official state religion and provided for a supreme committee of mujtahids to review all new legislation to verify its conformity to the shari‘ah. When the new shah, Muhammad Ali, reluctantly approved the Supplementary Fundamental Laws in late 1907, it appeared that the long tradition of authoritarian Iranian monarchy had come to an end.

However, Muhammad Ali Shah was determined to restore Qajar authority. A deteriorating economic situation accompanied by inflation and high prices for basic foodstuffs bred lower-class discontent with the Majlis government and encouraged mass support for a Qajar restoration. The royalists used ulama loyal to the shah to denounce the constitutionalists as atheists and to ignite popular sentiment in favor of the monarchy. At this critical juncture, external forces played an important role in determining the fate of the fragile constitutional experiment. In August 1907, Britain and Russia signed the entente in which they agreed to divide Iran into spheres of influence; Britain would dominate the southeast, Russia would control the north, and a neutral zone would exist in the center. The royalists could show that the constitutional government had been even less effective than the shahs in preserving Iranian sovereignty. With popular unrest building and more members of the ulama denouncing the constitutionalists, the royalist position became more favorable. Muhammad Ali staged his counterrevolution in June 1908. He sent the Cossack Brigade to close the Majlis, arrested and executed leading constitutionalists, and reestablished royal authority in Tehran. Iran was plunged into civil war and economic chaos.

The eleven months of warfare starkly demonstrated the inadequacy of the government's armed forces. The shah held on to Tehran, but other areas of the country loyal to the constitutionalists refused to submit to his authority. During summer 1909, an armed rebel force from the province of Azerbaijan advanced on Tehran from the north while a confederation of Bakhtiyari tribesmen moved up from the south. The two forces entered the capital in July and restored the constitution. Muhammad Ali Shah was deposed in favor of his young son, who became shah under a regency. The second Majlis convened in August 1909. The constitution had been successfully defended, but it remained to be seen whether a constitutional regime representing such diverse interests could govern effectively.

Over the next two years, the Majlis was the scene of constant friction between the reformers and an alliance of bazaaris and ulama. The coalition that had been united in opposition to the Qajar regime fractured over such issues as the relationship between the state and the religious establishment, the question of equal rights for non-Muslims, and the extent and pace of social reform. (These same issues would resurface in the aftermath of the 1979 revolution.) The verbal arguments in the Majlis were transformed into armed clashes on Tehran's streets between supporters of the various political factions. Government became paralyzed, and an age-old pattern repeated itself. With the central government torn apart by internal disputes, the tribal confederations reasserted their independence and refused to pay taxes; law and order completely broke down in the rural areas.

As the tribes roamed and looted, the British landed troops at Bushire in October 1911 to protect the stability of their sphere of influence. This objective had become all the more urgent with the discovery of oil in 1908. When the British occupied southern Iran, Russia invaded the north and, in November, threatened to occupy Tehran unless the government accepted an ultimatum demanding the dismissal of a newly appointed US financial adviser. When the Majlis rejected the ultimatum, the prime minister and the cabinet dissolved the assembly. The Russian demands were then granted, and the period of the constitutional revolution was over.

On the eve of World War I, the Majlis remained suspended, and Iran was governed by conservative ministers whose actions Britain and Russia closely monitored. In addition, the country's northern and southern halves were under foreign military occupation. The occupying powers dealt with tribal leaders and local merchants without consideration for the government in Tehran. Iran had gained a constitution and eliminated the authority of the Qajar shahs, but in the process it had become divided against itself. Not only did the coalition of bazaaris, ulama, and reformers crack under the pressures of governing, but the objective that had brought them together—the reduction of the foreign presence in Iran—had been thwarted. The casting aside of traditional institutions, no matter how desirable it might appear, was a painful process that did not always produce the intended results.

CONCLUSION

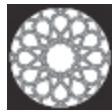

Under the twin pressures of European economic and imperial expansion and mounting domestic discontent, members of the Ottoman and Iranian elite sought to readjust the governing institutions of their states. In the Ottoman Empire, the Young Turks restored the constitution of 1876, hoping that its promises of equality for all Ottoman citizens would generate a spirit of unity and a willingness to embrace reform. However, the Young Turks pursued a policy of Ottomanism at a time when the various ethnic communities within the empire demanded either independence or greater political and cultural autonomy. The CUP government's attempts to balance Ottomanism with stricter central controls alienated the groups that had benefited from the long reign of Abdul Hamid II. Yet despite the centrifugal forces at work, the majority of the empire's Arab and Turkish inhabitants remained loyal to the Ottoman state and believed European encroachment should be resisted.

Iran experienced a constitutional revolution with the same larger objective as the Young Turk revolt: to preserve the state from internal collapse and external aggression. But within Iran, the forces favoring a constitution had different ideas about what the constitution should achieve. For the ulama and the bazaaris, the new regime was to reduce European economic activity and preserve their customary position in the social hierarchy. But the European-inspired reformers hoped for a more thorough transformation that would introduce secular laws and a strong legislative assembly. Once the constitution was proclaimed, the differences among the coalition members burst into the open and made effective governance impossible. Moreover, the central state and the armed forces were so weak and the treasury was so depleted that neither a royal nor a constitutional regime could exert authority. As the situation in Iran deteriorated, Britain and Russia attempted to keep order in their zones of influence by occupying them. The first of several twentieth-century violations of Iran's sovereignty by outside powers, these moves bred intense Iranian resentment against foreign intervention.

CHAPTER 9

WORLD WAR I AND THE END OF THE OTTOMAN ORDER

The assassination of Austrian Archduke Ferdinand in Sarajevo on June 28, 1914, led to Austria's invasion of Serbia. The Austrian invasion activated the European alliance system, and by August, the Continent was at war. The alliance of the Triple Entente—Britain, France, and Russia—was pitted against the Central Powers: Germany and Austria-Hungary. As Europe prepared for the conflict, the Ottoman cabinet remained divided on what action to take. Although the majority of CUP leaders favored neutrality, some in the government wished to use the European war as an opportunity to strike at Russia, the traditional Ottoman enemy. In the end, the empire's fateful decision to join the Central Powers was determined by a small group within the CUP led by Enver Pasha, a Germanophile. On August 2, 1914, Enver concluded a secret Ottoman-German alliance against Russia; the alliance was activated on October 29, when the Ottoman fleet bombarded several Russian ports on the Black Sea. The empire had thus entered the last of its many wars.

Although the Ottoman Empire was defeated in the conflict and dismembered by the peace treaties, its ability to endure four years of total warfare testified to the tenacity with which its civilian and military populations defended the Ottoman order. The state mobilized more than 1 million Ottoman soldiers, and the Ottoman armies achieved impressive successes on several different fronts. In domestic affairs, the CUP government introduced programs that had not only an immediate transforming impact but also significant long-term effects on the future development of the Turkish republic. The CUP's attempt to break the empire's economic dependence on foreigners and local religious minorities exemplifies these changes. The wartime economic policies were necessary in part because so much of the empire's trade and investment was in the hands of firms from the Entente powers, whose governments were at war with the Ottomans. Thus, in 1914, the CUP renounced the Capitulations, introduced protectionist tariffs, and adopted measures bringing foreign enterprises under Ottoman jurisdiction and subjecting them to Ottoman taxes. This assertion of economic independence was carried further by the CUP's policy of granting government contracts to Turkish Muslim entrepreneurs, some of whom reaped enormous wartime profits in trade and transportation. These grants both created more favorable investment opportunities for Muslim businessmen and reduced the advantages held by Europeans and their local Christian associates.

The war also accelerated the transformation of the Ottoman social order. With masses of men mobilized for military service, more women entered the civil service and the mainstream professions. The CUP recognized the changing circumstances by legislating a major new family law in 1917. The law placed the shari‘ah courts under the authority of the Ministry of Justice, thus giving a secular state agency control over family law and personal status, the last important areas of jurisdiction that had remained to the religious establishment. The transfer from religious to secular authority was emphasized in sections of the new law that recognized women's right to initiate divorce and restricting the grounds for polygamy.

The war resulted in the division of the Ottoman Empire and the occupation of its Arab provinces by Britain and France. In Anatolia, however, an independent Turkish republic emerged out of the Ottoman defeat. The new republic's survival owed much to the Ottoman war effort, which not only enlarged the pool of trained soldiers, officers, and civil servants but also produced an atmosphere in which the public was accustomed to social change and therefore receptive to the sweeping reforms of the 1920s.

THE MIDDLE EAST IN WORLD WAR I: AN OVERVIEW OF MILITARY AND DIPLOMATIC INITIATIVES

The Ottoman armies performed much more effectively throughout the war than their opponents had anticipated. Following the military debacle in the Balkan Wars of 1912–1913, the CUP was determined to improve the armed forces. In early 1914 the German general Liman von Sanders arrived in Istanbul at the head of a large German military mission. The CUP granted the mission extensive powers, and its efforts, combined with the government's willingness to introduce far-reaching military reforms, had begun to produce noticeable results by the war's outbreak. Although German officers occasionally commanded Ottoman armies during the fighting, the overall direction of the war effort remained in Ottoman hands.

Because of its extensive borders, the empire was vulnerable to attack at various points, a problem that necessitated posting troops on several fronts simultaneously. In eastern Anatolia and the Caucasus region, Ottoman and Russian armies engaged in constant warfare until 1917. The eastern campaign was launched by a reckless offensive, personally led by Enver Pasha, in winter 1914–1915. Despite some early success, Enver exposed his troops to such an irresponsibly high casualty rate that what was left of his army was in no condition to resist a Russian counterattack in spring 1915. As the Russians pushed the Ottoman eastern army back from Erzurum, Enver retired to Istanbul. He remained in charge of the Ottoman war effort, but he did not again command an army in the field. The Ottoman forces on the eastern front adopted a defensive posture until the Russian withdrawal in the aftermath of the Bolshevik Revolution of 1917. At that point, after four years of fighting, the Ottomans still retained sufficient resources to mount an offensive that retook most of their prewar territory.

It was in this eastern theater that the CUP carried out its notorious operations against the Armenian community. Although most Armenians remained loyal to the Ottoman state, nationalist organizations in Russia and Anatolia saw the war as an opportunity to create an independent Armenia. Armenian volunteer units served in the Russian army, and there was agitation for a homeland in and around the Anatolian city of Van. On the grounds that some Armenians were collaborating with the Russians, an influential CUP faction decided that the Armenian villagers within Anatolia constituted a behind-the-lines threat to the Ottoman forces in the field and ordered collective reprisals against the entire Armenian population. Beginning in early 1915, the regime instituted a systematic policy of forced evacuation of Armenians from eastern and southern Anatolia. Hundreds of thousands were uprooted from their villages and sent south toward the Syrian desert in what amounted to a death march. Countless numbers perished of starvation and illness along the deportation routes, and there can be little doubt that many others were killed before they left Anatolia. The survivors found a refuge—though not always a welcome one—in Lebanon, where they tended eventually to congregate in Beirut. Nor were Armenians in Istanbul spared; on April 15, 1915, about 200 prominent members of the capital's Armenian community were arrested, deported, and, according to some sources, later executed.¹ Debate still rages between members of the Armenian community in Europe and the United States, who accuse the Ottomans of genocide, and the Turkish government, which insists that the excesses have been overemphasized. But any episode in which as many as 1 million civilians may have lost their lives is an appalling one, whether it was calculated or the unintended result of internal security measures, and a growing number of Turkish scholars are forcing their country to honestly confront its past.

Once the Russian counterattack on the eastern front gained momentum, the Allies opened two new fronts against the Ottomans. The first was aimed at Istanbul, the second at Mesopotamia—and the Ottomans repulsed both. The objective of the Gallipoli campaign, which began in February 1915, was to force open the Dardanelles and capture Istanbul, thereby cutting the Ottomans off from Germany and opening Russia to Entente supply lines through the Black Sea. When Ottoman shore-based artillery prevented the Allied naval squadron from penetrating the Dardanelles, an expeditionary force of 200,000 British and French troops was put ashore on the Gallipoli peninsula. In the ensuing clash, the Ottoman defenses inflicted heavy casualties on the Allied troops, forcing their evacuation in January 1916. It was during the Gallipoli campaign that the young Ottoman colonel Mustafa Kemal, the future Atatürk, gained a reputation as a resourceful military commander.

At the empire's other geographical extreme, the head of the Persian Gulf, two compelling imperial concerns shaped British military strategy. One was the ever-present imperative to defend the approaches to India; the second was the need to protect the Iranian oil fields. The former was a cornerstone of British policy; the latter had become equally important with the conversion of the British navy from coal to oil fuel in 1912. Thus, even before the onset of the Ottoman-Russian campaigns on the eastern Anatolian front, an army from British India occupied the port city of Basra in late 1914 and advanced toward Baghdad. However, the commander of the Anglo-Indian expedition was deceived by his initial successes and underestimated the resourcefulness of his Ottoman adversaries. In 1915, an Ottoman counterattack drove the British force back to the village of Kut where, after suffering a lengthy siege, it ignominiously surrendered in 1916. But the Mesopotamian front was too important for the British to ignore, and in March 1917, an expeditionary force captured Baghdad and brought southern Iraq under British control.

Another important—and, as it turned out, decisive—front existed between the borders of Ottoman Syria and British-occupied Egypt. All the belligerents recognized it as strategically vital because it was the key to the Suez Canal. In January 1915, as Enver was conducting his costly Anatolian campaign, Jamal Pasha led an Ottoman army of 80,000 men across the Sinai Peninsula for a quick strike against the Suez Canal. Although the concept of an attack on the unprepared British defenses in Egypt was militarily sound, the campaign was poorly coordinated, and the Ottoman forces were driven back before they could cross the canal. Alarmed by the near success of Jamal Pasha's attack, the British began a massive buildup of troops in Egypt. By early 1917, having assembled a large army, the British launched their own offensive. Under the command of General Edmund Allenby, the British army moved in a wide front against the Ottoman forces in Palestine. The campaign was aided by the irregular forces of the Arab Revolt, which operated on its right flank and conducted guerrilla operations behind Ottoman lines. Although Jerusalem was captured in December 1917, the Syrian campaign was by no means over. Ottoman resistance stiffened in 1918, and Allenby's superb supply lines to Egypt alone kept the British offensive from bogging down. By autumn the British had renewed their offensive, and the Ottoman collapse came rapidly. On October 1, the forces of the Arab Revolt captured Damascus; a few days later, the French fleet took Beirut; and by the month's end, the Ottoman armies had retreated to Anatolia, where they prepared to make another defensive stand. But on October 31, 1918, the government in Istanbul signed the Armistice of Mudros, a document of unconditional surrender that brought an end to the war in the Middle East and, with it, the end of the Ottoman Empire.

The victors now swooped in to divide the spoils. Less than a month after the armistice was signed, an Allied fleet anchored off Istanbul, and the imperial capital was brought under British military occupation. With Britain in occupation of most of the Arabic-speaking provinces and a French force stationed in Beirut, the Allies were in full control of the disposal of Ottoman territory. But they were also bound, or so some parties thought, to honor the treaties and agreements they had entered into during the war.

Ottoman Wartime Administration in Greater Syria

To rally the Muslim population of the empire to the cause of the war and to arouse Muslim opinion against Britain and France, the CUP government mobilized all the Islamic symbols it could muster. In November 1914, the sultan-caliph issued a call to jihad, urging Muslims the world over to unite behind the Ottoman Empire in its confrontation with the Triple Entente. The caliph's proclamation portrayed the Entente powers as bent on destroying Muslim sovereignty around the globe and warned Muslims that unless they responded to the jihad, Islam faced extinction. This action showed that the Ottoman Empire still viewed itself as Islam's universal protector. And the support the vast majority of Ottoman Muslims gave to the empire's war effort demonstrated that even though the CUP government was not well liked, the population at large shared its devotion to defending the Ottoman-Islamic order against European ambitions.

For its part, despite the absence of any overt antigovernment agitation, the CUP remained suspicious about the loyalties of the Arab population of Greater Syria, especially the inhabitants of the urban centers. These suspicions stemmed from the formation of Arab political and cultural societies before the war and the close ties that some members of the Arab Christian community maintained with France. To ensure the stability and loyalty of Greater Syria, the CUP adopted a special wartime regime for the region by placing it under the direct supervision of Jamal Pasha, one of the ruling triumvirate.

Jamal Pasha arrived in Damascus shortly after the war's outbreak, entrusted with extensive military and civilian powers; he was commander of the Ottoman Fourth Army stationed in Damascus as well as governor of the provinces of Greater Syria. By the time he left Damascus in early 1918, Jamal Pasha was known among locals as al-Saffah, the Blood Shedder, and his policies had alienated large segments of the Arab population from the CUP. Jamal Pasha's administration began cordially enough. The governor was committed to the cause of Islamic solidarity, and he announced his appreciation for the Arab contribution to Islam. However, following his failed attack on the Suez Canal, his conciliatory tactics for maintaining tranquility in the Syrian provinces gave way to a campaign of repression.

Convinced that some Arab leaders were in secret contact with Britain and France, Jamal Pasha deported large numbers of them to Anatolia and placed several dozen others under house arrest in Jerusalem and Damascus. In 1915, he began to imprison Arab notables whom he suspected of disloyalty and to send them before military tribunals to be interrogated and tried. Using information from documents left behind in the French consulate in Beirut in 1914, Jamal charged his prisoners with treason. Eleven of those convicted were publicly hanged in Beirut in August 1915; an additional twenty-one were similarly executed in Beirut and Damascus in May 1916. The hangings shocked Arab society. The victims included an Arab senator, three Arab parliamentary deputies, leading journalists, and members of distinguished notable families of Greater Syria. A few of the accused may have been involved in prewar political discussions with French diplomats, but most were singled out because of their earlier activities in the Ottoman Decentralization Party. The coincidental timing of the second wave of executions—one month before the proclamation of the Arab Revolt—gave the victims an aura of martyrdom, and their deaths came to be associated with the cause of Arabism.

If Jamal Pasha managed to arouse intense anti-CUP sentiments in the provinces under his control, he nevertheless succeeded in preventing those sentiments from receiving public expression. The Arabs of Greater Syria, most of whom had been loyal to the Ottoman cause from the start, were cowed into fearful and sullen submission. There was no uprising in Syria and very little anti-Ottoman activity for the duration of the war. Moreover, Jamal Pasha did not completely abandon the Ottoman practice of using local notables as intermediaries between the government and the population. Those notables he favored viewed the hangings as regrettable but necessary security measures, and they continued to serve the Ottoman war effort as members of parliament and local administrators. Although Syria had been the source of the first expressions of prewar Arabism, Jamal Pasha's harsh repression and the continuing Ottoman loyalties of many within the Arab elite meant that any organized movement for Arab separation would have to originate elsewhere than Syria.

Sharif Husayn ibn Ali and the Arab Revolt

Ottoman entry into the war had aroused concerns in British circles over the question of Islamic solidarity. The sultan-caliph's proclamation of jihad against the Entente had the potential to cause much unrest both along Britain's imperial route to India and within India. British officials sought out a Muslim dignitary who might be persuaded to ally with the Entente powers and thus serve as a counterweight to the prestige of the Ottoman sultan-caliph. They thought they had found him in the person of Sharif Husayn ibn Ali, the amir of Mecca. Because much of the history of the post–World War I Middle East has revolved around interpretations of the promises Britain made to Sharif Husayn, it is important to understand the development of the proposals, the context in which they were made, and the actions that resulted from them.

The office of amir of Mecca was the most prestigious Arab-Islamic position within the Ottoman Empire. Its holder was the guardian of the holy cities of Mecca and Medina. Although the Ottoman governor of the Hijaz was in charge of administrative affairs and military security in the region, the amir of Mecca held a curiously autonomous position as the individual responsible for maintaining the sanctity of the two holy cities and ensuring the proper and safe conduct of the annual pilgrimage. In addition, the amir of Mecca was selected from among those families claiming direct descent from the Prophet and thus bore the honorific title of sharif. Abdul Hamid II appointed Husayn ibn Ali (1855–1931), a sharif from the family of Hashim, to the office of amir in 1908. An ambitious man who distrusted the CUP on political and religious grounds, Husayn devoted his first years in office to the construction of a network of tribal alliances that would enable him to obtain a greater degree of autonomy from Istanbul. He hoped to secure sufficient power to make the office of amir of Mecca hereditary within his family. The outbreak of World War I catapulted these traditional—and limited—objectives onto the stage of international diplomacy.

PHOTO 9.2. The Ottoman Army in 1917. The product of a century of reform efforts, the sultan's military enjoyed significant successes at Gallipoli, Kut, and the eastern front during World War I. (Trustees of the Imperial War Museum, London)

The CUP government, as wary of Husayn as he was of it, endeavored to persuade him to declare his support for the caliph's jihad and to commit contingents of his tribal levies to the Ottoman war effort. The sharif hedged as he tried to decide whether his personal ambitions were best served by supporting Ottomanism or by pursuing other alternatives. In July 1915 Husayn sent a letter to the British high commissioner in Egypt, Sir Henry McMahon, setting forth the conditions that might persuade him to enter into an alliance with Britain and to launch a revolt against his own Ottoman government. This was the beginning of the famous Husayn-McMahon correspondence (July 1915–March 1916), an exchange of ten letters that lie at the root of an immense controversy over whether Britain pledged to support an independent Arab state and then reneged.

Britain was receptive to the idea of an Arab rebellion against the Ottomans as well as to the opportunity of acquiring a Muslim ally of Husayn's distinction, so McMahon was instructed to follow up on Husayn's initiative. The thorniest issue in their correspondence concerned frontiers. Husayn, claiming to represent all Arabs, requested British recognition of an independent Arab state embracing the Arabian Peninsula, the provinces of Greater Syria (including Lebanon and Palestine), and the provinces of Iraq —essentially the Arabic-speaking world east of Egypt—in exchange for his commitment to lead an armed rebellion against the Ottomans. Britain sought to protect its own future interests in the region as well as those of its ally, France. Husayn was informed that the area lying west of a line from Damascus, Homs, Hama, and Aleppo (see Map 9.1) could not be included in the proposed Arab state because its inhabitants were not purely Arab. This was stretching a point; the real reason McMahon refused to offer Husayn control over the Syrian coast was that it was claimed by France.

Throughout the exchange of notes, Husayn rejected this exclusion and McMahon insisted on it. In the end, the matter was postponed until after the war. However, Husayn made it clear that he would not abandon the Arab claim to coastal Syria. McMahon also attempted to secure Husayn's agreement to a special British position in the Iraqi provinces of Baghdad and Basra. Husayn insisted that these territories were an integral part of the Arab heritage, but he did consent to a temporary British postwar occupation of them until a stable administration could be established. McMahon accepted Husayn's territorial demands, subject to future negotiations over Syria and the British presence in parts of Iraq, and pledged that "Great Britain is prepared to recognize and uphold the independence of the Arabs in all the regions lying within the frontiers proposed by the Sharif of Mecca."²

In addition to agreeing to recognize an independent Arab state after the war, Britain promised to provide Husayn with supplies, weapons, and funds for his revolt against the Ottomans and to recognize an Arab caliphate should one be proclaimed. Husayn, in turn, committed himself to an all-out armed uprising and to a denunciation of the Ottoman regime as an enemy of Islam. Both parties appeared to have attained their objectives. Husayn's ambitions had been secured by a Great Power guarantee, and Britain had acquired a well-placed Muslim ally. However, the imprecision of certain territorial agreements made future disputes over the true intention of Britain's pledge inevitable. Sharif Husayn was aware of this imprecision: He knew that he had asked for a larger Arab state than the Allies were prepared to recognize and that the final boundaries of that state would be subject to future negotiations. Nevertheless, even if he took into account all the reservations and qualifications of McMahon's letters, Husayn had reason to believe that he was promised an independent Arab state (albeit one in which Allied advisers would play an important role) in Arabia, interior Syria, parts of Iraq, and possibly Palestine.

MAP 9.1. The Ottoman Empire in 1914.

McMahon's language was so ambiguous and vague that it has given rise to widely conflicting interpretations over whether Palestine was included as part of the future independent Arab state. Palestine was not specifically mentioned in the correspondence, but British officials later claimed that the region was part of the coastal Syrian territory that had been reserved for France and was thus excluded from the Arab state, even though it lay south of the Damascus-Aleppo line McMahon mentioned. However, this argument had its flaws. Because Palestine was indeed located south of Damascus, proponents of the Arab claim to the region argued that it could not possibly have been part of the territory lying west of the Damascus-Aleppo line and that it must therefore have been included in the Arab state promised to Husayn. It is likely that during his negotiations with Husayn, McMahon paid little attention to Palestine as a distinct region and probably intended it to be part of the Arab state. It may seem as though questions over who was promised what specific territory were rendered irrelevant by the postwar peace settlement; however, they continue to be raised because perceptions are often as important as legalities—and among politically aware Arabs, the perception existed and, after the war, deepened that Britain had made a pledge it did not honor and that the Arabs had been misled and then betrayed.

The Arab Revolt began on June 10, 1916, when Husayn's tribal forces attacked the Ottoman garrison at Mecca. By September most of the principal towns of the Hijaz were in Husayn's hands except Medina, which remained under siege for the war's duration. In proclamations justifying the revolt, Husayn appealed to the cause of Islamic solidarity. Aware of his delicate position in leading a rebellion against the Ottoman sultan, he portrayed his action as a duty to Islam. He called on all Muslims of the empire to join him in overthrowing the CUP regime, which was, he claimed, made up of a group of atheistic adventurers who ignored the Quran and the shari‘ah. Careful not to attack the caliph, Husayn urged Muslims to rise up and liberate their caliph from the clutches of the CUP. Such Islamic-oriented propaganda dominated the sharif's proclamations throughout the revolt. Husayn was not an Arab nationalist, and he did not think in terms of the ideology of Arabism; instead, he was an ambitious dynast who used his Islamic status as a sharif and the amir of Mecca in an attempt to acquire a hereditary kingdom or principality for his family.

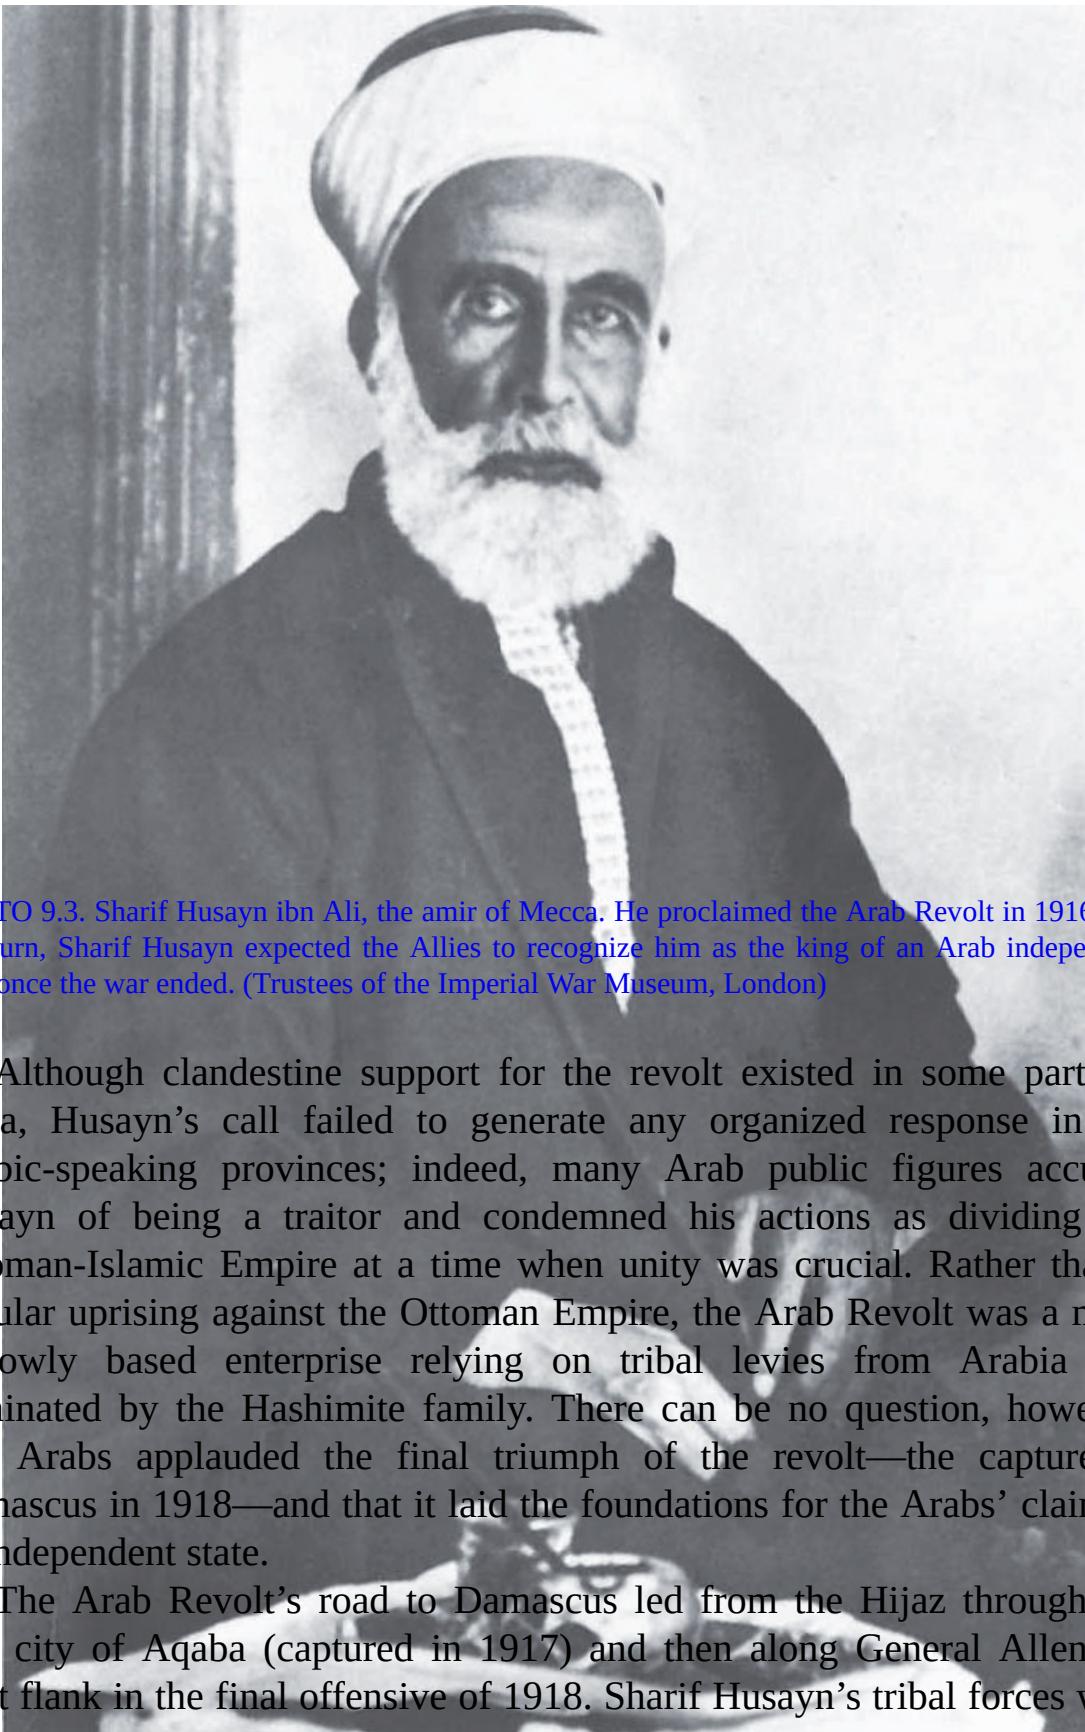

PHOTO 9.3. Sharif Husayn ibn Ali, the amir of Mecca. He proclaimed the Arab Revolt in 1916, and in return, Sharif Husayn expected the Allies to recognize him as the king of an Arab independent state once the war ended. (Trustees of the Imperial War Museum, London)

Although clandestine support for the revolt existed in some parts of Syria, Husayn's call failed to generate any organized response in the Arabic-speaking provinces; indeed, many Arab public figures accused Husayn of being a traitor and condemned his actions as dividing the Ottoman-Islamic Empire at a time when unity was crucial. Rather than a popular uprising against the Ottoman Empire, the Arab Revolt was a more narrowly based enterprise relying on tribal levies from Arabia and dominated by the Hashimite family. There can be no question, however, that Arabs applauded the final triumph of the revolt—the capture of Damascus in 1918—and that it laid the foundations for the Arabs' claim to an independent state.

The Arab Revolt's road to Damascus led from the Hijaz through the port city of Aqaba (captured in 1917) and then along General Allenby's right flank in the final offensive of 1918. Sharif Husayn's tribal forces were commanded by his son, Amir Faysal, who was assisted by a group of Iraqi ex-Ottoman officers and a small contingent of British military advisers, among them Captain T. E. Lawrence. Faysal generally tried to avoid pitched battles with the Ottomans and concentrated instead on disrupting enemy communications and supply lines. When he led his troops into Damascus on October 1, 1918, it marked the culmination of the Arab war effort. Faysal immediately began to set up an administration, believing that he was acting in accordance with Great Britain's pledge to his father.

Pledges and Counterpledges: Allied Plans for the Partition of the Ottoman Empire

During the war, the Entente powers signed a number of agreements among themselves on the future disposition of Ottoman territories. These agreements overlooked the needs of the Entente's Arab allies and were designed solely to serve the interests of the European members of the alliance by arranging for what one scholar has called "expansionist bookings-in-advance."³ The treaties' purpose was to preserve the Entente by resolving potential postwar disagreements before they surfaced. The agreements achieved this objective by providing advance territorial compensation to alliance members.

In 1915, when Russian armies were being battered by the Ottomans in eastern Anatolia and by the Germans in Poland, Britain and France became concerned that Russia’s willingness to pursue the war might evaporate. They therefore decided to offer the czar the most desirable “advance booking” possible. In what would have been an unthinkable proposition prior to the war, Britain, France, and Russia signed the Constantinople Agreement in March 1915, awarding Russia the right to annex Istanbul and the Turkish Straits. The Constantinople Agreement was never implemented, and it was no doubt with some relief that Britain and France received Lenin’s statement following the Russian Revolution in 1917 that the Bolshevik government was renouncing the czarist regime’s previous treaties with the Allies.

By far the most vexing interallied Middle Eastern issue was the constant tension between Britain and France over France’s claims to Ottoman Syria. As France was bearing the brunt of horrible trench warfare on the western front, it was unable to protect its Middle Eastern interests directly and viewed with alarm Britain’s growing military involvement in the region. To resolve this matter, negotiators from the two countries drew up a secret treaty in May 1916, dividing most of the Arab Middle East between them. Known as the Sykes-Picot Agreement, the treaty is one of the most controversial documents of the war because it appeared to contravene portions of Britain's pledge to Sharif Husayn. The agreement recognized long-standing French claims to Syria by awarding France a large zone of "direct control" stretching along the Syrian coast from southern Lebanon into Anatolia. In addition, it granted France a sphere of exclusive indirect influence in the Syrian interior. The British position in Iraq was similarly guaranteed; Britain gained the right to exercise "direct control" over the southern portion of Mesopotamia and was granted a huge zone of exclusive indirect influence stretching from Gaza to Kirkuk. The independent Arab state promised to Husayn was, in the Sykes-Picot Agreement, designated as a state or confederation of states lying in the two zones of British and French indirect influence. Under the terms of the agreement, Palestine was to be placed under international administration.

Finally, Great Britain made still another "advance booking" for yet another interested party. In an effort to appeal to US, Russian, and German Jewry and also to secure control over the territory adjacent to the Suez Canal, Britain agreed to favor the establishment of a Jewish national home in Palestine. This agreement—the famous Balfour Declaration of November 1917—was conveyed in a letter from Foreign Secretary Arthur Balfour to Lord Rothschild, a prominent British Zionist (see Chapter 13). If the British pledge to support (however indirectly) Jewish settlement in Palestine was to be implemented, Britain would have to remain in occupation of Palestine. In Arab eyes, any such action would violate the promise made to Husayn.

At war's end most Ottoman territory had been pledged to one or another of the Allied partners. Because some of the pledges contradicted one another, they could be implemented only by compromise or the exercise of armed force.

THE PEACE SETTLEMENT

An Overview

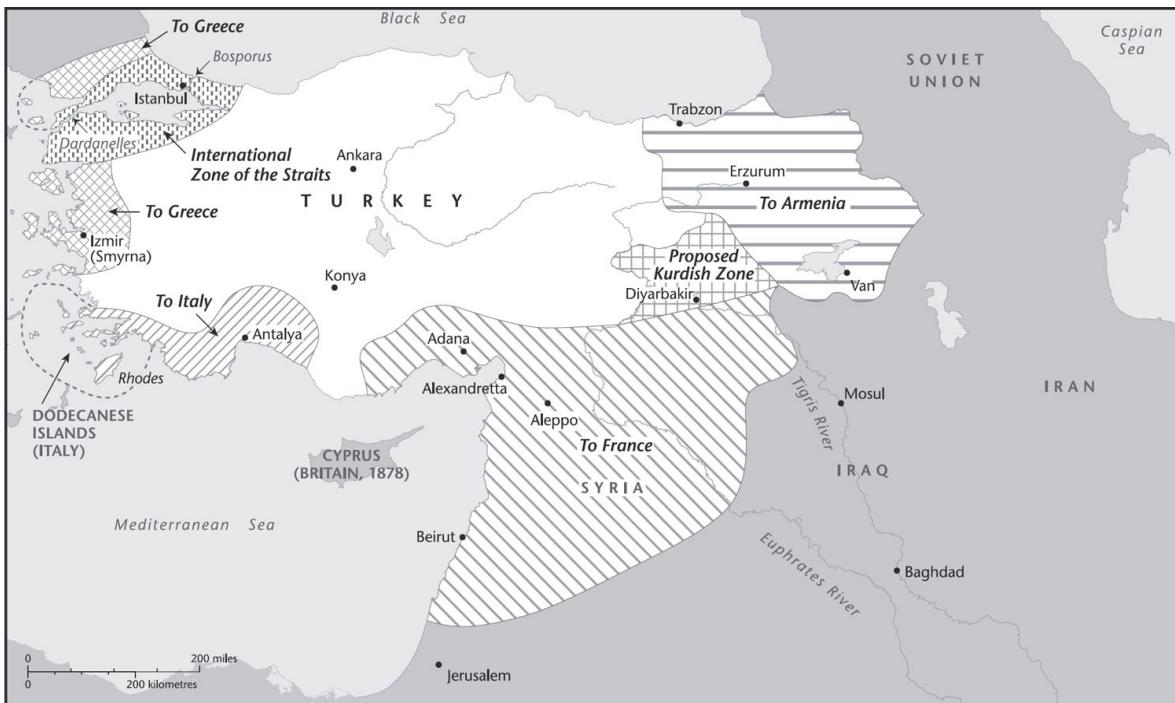

Future chapters will examine the impact of the peace settlement on individual Middle Eastern states. Here we review the process that led to the division and occupation of most of the former Ottoman territories. In January 1919, representatives from twenty-seven nations gathered in Paris to construct a peace settlement they hoped would prevent future wars. For most delegates, European issues had the highest priority, and during 1919, four separate treaties (with Germany, Austria, Hungary, and Bulgaria) were drawn up and signed. However, the formulation of a postwar settlement for the Middle East required longer negotiations and involved the Allies in frequent disputes among themselves. Terms of an Ottoman settlement were finally agreed upon at the San Remo Conference (April 1920) and incorporated into the Treaty of Sèvres, which the Ottoman government reluctantly signed on August 10, 1920.

The portions of the treaty that dealt with Anatolia were extremely harsh and amounted to a virtual partition of the original core of the Ottoman Empire (see Map 9.2). Although the victors intended for an Ottoman state and government to remain in existence, the territory over which the state was to exercise sovereignty was severely circumscribed. The straits between the Black and Mediterranean seas were removed from Istanbul's authority and placed under the jurisdiction of an international commission. The treaty awarded spheres of influence in southern Anatolia to France and Italy. Greece, which had not joined the Entente until 1917, received the Ottomans' last European province, Thrace; Greece was also authorized to establish a military and administrative presence in the major Anatolian port city of Izmir. In drawing up the settlement, the Allied negotiators were compelled to take into consideration the new principle of national self-determination—yet they chose to apply the principle only when it furthered their own interests or coincided with their sympathies. It was doubtless for the latter reason that the Treaty of Sèvres recognized an independent Armenian state in eastern Anatolia and Russian Caucasia. The Allies also agreed that the Kurdish regions of eastern Anatolia should have semiautonomous status. In approving self-determination for the Armenians and partial self-determination for the Kurds, however, the Allies made it clear that they would not provide military or financial assistance to these two fledgling nations. They did not, therefore, endure for long.

The decisions reached at the San Remo Conference detached the Arab provinces from Ottoman authority and apportioned them between Britain and France. The former provinces were divided into entities called mandates, a term to be further discussed in the introduction to Part Three. It can be noted here that the mandate system was little more than nineteenth-century imperialism repackaged to give the appearance of self-determination. Britain received the mandates for Iraq and Palestine; France, the mandate for Syria. Iraq was a completely new state created out of three Ottoman provinces—Basra, Baghdad, and Mosul—with little in common. By acquiring control over this new entity, Britain enhanced its position in the Persian Gulf, secured the approaches to India, and gained access to petroleum resources. The third Arab state over which Britain exercised direct influence, Transjordan, did not exist at the time the Treaty of Sèvres was drawn up. The hasty creation of Transjordan was a result of the manner in which France took control of its Syrian mandate and is best understood in the context of that event.

MAP 9.2. The division of the former Ottoman territories under the Treaty of Sèvres, 1920. This treaty's harsh terms inspired a Turkish resistance movement that nullified it and resulted in the establishment of an independent Turkish state embracing Thrace, the Straits, and all of Anatolia.

The Rise and Fall of Faisal's Syrian Kingdom, 1918–1920

While the Allies gathered in Paris to sort out their conflicting interests, Amir Faisal was forming an Arab government in Damascus. All the currents of the Ottoman past and the conflicting visions of the Arab future came together in Faisal's fledgling administration.

It was staffed by young Arab activists with dreams of a united Syria and Palestine, by ex-Ottoman officials and military officers who converged on Damascus once there was no longer an Ottoman state to serve, and by prominent local Syrian notables who wished to preserve their customary influence. Added to the mix were leaders of the sharifian forces who felt that their military contribution to the Arab Revolt merited the reward of political office. Although these competing factions tended to limit the effectiveness of Faisal's administration, hopes for the new state soared high. In March 1920, representatives from throughout Syria met at a general Syrian congress and proclaimed Syria an independent state, with Faisal as its king. In many quarters of the Arab world, this action seemed to signify the rebirth of an Arab kingdom on the site of the former Umayyad imperial capital.

To France, however, the declaration of Syrian independence signified a usurpation of French claims to the region and a violation of the Franco-British agreement to divide the Arab areas more or less equally between them. In this instance, the wartime agreements were enforced. Despite pleas Faisal made during the peace conference, Britain and France were determined that the satisfaction of their regional interests and the preservation of their alliance should take precedence over all other considerations. This meant that the French claim to Syria had to be recognized; put another way, it meant that Britain had to renounce any support it may have been prepared to give Faisal and his Syrian kingdom. These conditions were realized in the decisions of the San Remo Conference, which, as noted above, assigned the mandate for Syria to France.

Within Syria, anger and confusion attended the San Remo pronouncements. The Arab nationalist bloc in the government urged Faisal to defy the Allied powers, whereas more cautious voices counseled him to seek a compromise that might somehow satisfy French demands and still preserve the Syrian kingdom. Uncertain what advice to follow, Faisal endeavored to open negotiations with the French commander in Beirut, General Henri Gouraud. But Gouraud was in no mood for compromises and ordered his troops to march on Syria. On July 24, 1920, the French forces easily defeated Faysal's army, occupied Damascus, and forced the king of Syria into exile in Europe. The independent Arab state was eliminated only five months after it was proclaimed.

The French occupation of Damascus provoked a response from Sharif Husayn's family that necessitated one final bit of territorial allocation. In the aftermath of Faysal's expulsion from Syria, his brother, Amir Abdallah, led a tribal contingent from Mecca to Ma'an, a desert town east of the Jordan River. Abdallah had no clear-cut objective, and his forces posed no direct threat to the Anglo-French position in the Arab world. However, his presence in Ma'an had the potential to rally dissident local tribes. The British therefore decided to integrate Abdallah into their informal imperial network, hoping that he would serve as a source of stability in the unoccupied region east of the Jordan and that his presence as a British client would prevent the spread of French influence south from Syria. Accordingly, Abdallah was offered the opportunity to set up an administration in Amman under British administrative guidance; his territory would be added to the Palestine mandate, but it would be exempted from the stipulations of the Balfour Declaration. Abdallah accepted the terms, additional frontiers were penciled in on the map of the Middle East, and in 1921, the unusual desert amirate of Transjordan came into existence.

The creation of Transjordan completed the apportionment of the Arab territories of the defeated Ottoman Empire. The Arab provinces, once part of an imperial whole, were divided into a group of regional states administered by Britain and France (compare maps 9.1 and 9.3). Sharif Husayn remained in Mecca, but he would be discarded as an ally when the British discovered another Arab chieftain who appeared more able to serve their interests. For the Arabs, the war's aftermath produced bitterness toward the Western powers and a deep-seated sense of betrayal. Although arguably Husayn was aware of the ambiguities in Britain's pledges and knew Anglo-French claims would have to be satisfied, he and other Arab leaders expected a much different postwar settlement from the one imposed on them.

MAP 9.3. The Middle East in the interwar period.

From the Arab perspective, the British pledges to Husayn had been sacrificed to the requirements of Allied harmony and imperial self-interest. Arab opinion tended to be distrustful of Anglo-French intentions in the years that followed, and the mandate period was marked by recriminations over secret diplomacy—and haunted by lingering visions of what might have been if Faysal's Syrian kingdom had been allowed to survive.

CONCLUSION: THE END OF THE OTTOMAN ORDER IN THE MIDDLE EAST

For the Arab peoples who had lived within the sultan's domains, the dismemberment of the Ottoman Empire marked more than just the end of a particular state; it also marked the end of a political, social, and religious order that had shaped public behavior for 400 years. Ottoman rule had been applied with differing degrees of intensity in various regions of the Arab provinces. That adaptability was the very essence of the Ottoman system, which directly governed areas that could be efficiently controlled and allowed latitude to chieftains and feudal amirs in more remote locations. Even in such areas of direct control as the urban centers of Greater Syria, the Ottoman governors exercised authority in association with the local Arab notables. The latter retained some degree of local power in exchange for cooperating with the representatives of the central Ottoman state. As well as permitting a measure of regional political autonomy, the pragmatic Ottoman rule tolerated a rich diversity of religious and cultural practices throughout the Arab provinces. But the governments of the postwar successor states, first under European control and later under independent Arab regimes, would not be so accommodating. Practicing what their rulers believed was modern government, the new states would seek to impose strict central control over rural tribes and urban dwellers alike and to instill in all citizens a measure of cultural uniformity. This is not to suggest that the Ottoman system was superior but rather to point out the stresses to which former Ottoman peoples would be subjected in their new capacity as citizens of emerging nation-states.

The Ottoman Empire had also provided its subjects with a secure sense of belonging to a larger universal order. That order was represented on the one hand by the Ottoman dynasty and its ruling sultan and on the other by the Islamic institutions and practices the sultans made such a point of upholding. The empire achieved legitimacy in the eyes of its subjects not just because of its ability to provide a stable government but also because of its rulers' determination to ensure that the political and social order was based on the enforcement of shari‘ah justice, respect for the role of the ulama, patronage of religious education, and protection of the holy cities. In summary, the Ottoman Empire not only embodied the achievements of the Islamic past; it also offered hope, through its continued existence and independence, that a distinctly Islamic state could survive in a world of expansionist European powers. A Muslim Arab subject of the sultan could be comfortable in such a state. But by 1920, neither that state nor its Islamic institutions held sway in the Middle East, and its former Arab and Turkish subjects were left adrift.

The Ottoman system had never been static, but in its final century it underwent considerable transformation. As we have seen, the reform movement served to strengthen the empire's administrative efficiency and the military capability, but at the same time the reforms, by their nature, were bound to undermine certain foundations on which the Ottoman order rested. Yet despite the institutional changes and the spread of nationalist revolts in the Balkans, the Arab inhabitants of the empire neither wished for nor anticipated its collapse and replacement by a regional Arab state system. As shown in Chapter 8, the doctrine of Arabism had surfaced before the war, but it was not so much a program for political independence as a demand for Arab autonomy within an Ottoman framework. Thus, at the outbreak of the war, Ottomanism, with its Islamic associations, remained the dominant ideology in the Arabic-speaking provinces. And for all the attention that Jamal Pasha's repression and Sharif Husayn's revolt later received, they did not detach the majority of Arabs from their Ottoman loyalties during the war years. But by the war's end in 1918, Ottomanism was irrelevant. What forces of political loyalty and cultural identity could replace it?

For a time, it appeared that Faysal's Syrian kingdom, with its Pan-Arab orientation, might fill the void left by the Ottoman defeat, but that dream proved illusory. With the French occupation of Damascus and the creation of regional states, the Arab elites were compelled, almost by default, to focus on developments in their own new states. Whereas previously the Arabs had been inhabitants of Ottoman provinces, they now had to forge new identities as Iraqis, Syrians, and Palestinians—a major change from Ottomanism. However, one element in the post-Ottoman Middle East remained constant: The individuals who rose to political prominence in the new mandate states were mainly those who had held positions of influence within the Ottoman system, whether they were local notables or ex-Ottoman civil servants and military officers. The continued domination of this Ottoman-era elite ensured that certain patterns of Ottoman-style political behavior and social attitudes would prevail in the postwar era. How these established patterns of thought and action responded to the demands brought about by changed circumstances is examined in the next part of this book.

THE STRUGGLE FOR INDEPENDENCE

The Interwar Era to the End of World War II

The Middle East becomes a much more complicated area of study after the end of World War I. During the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, three centers of authority—Egypt, the Ottoman Empire, and Iran—controlled the region. While European powers exercised various degrees of influence within each of these centers, Cairo, Istanbul, and Tehran were the capital cities for most of the Middle East's inhabitants. However, following the peace settlement and the establishment of the mandates, a new regional state system came into existence. The core of the Ottoman Empire was fragmented into six states: Turkey and the five new Arab states of Syria, Lebanon, Palestine, Iraq, and Transjordan. Saudi Arabia and Yemen also emerged as distinct political entities. The three centers of authority expanded to ten core Middle Eastern states, each with its own domestic and foreign policy. But European occupiers determined the policies of most of these new states. Of the ten, only Turkey, Iran, Saudi Arabia, and Yemen exercised full sovereignty during the interwar era, and the latter two were allowed independence solely because they were isolated and because Britain and France regarded them as relatively unimportant. Even Iran's interwar sovereignty was temporary. For a time, it appeared that Reza Khan, the military commander who seized the throne and proclaimed himself shah, was following Turkey's pattern of national self-assertiveness.

With the onset of World War II, however, Britain and the Soviet Union invaded Iran and quashed any expectations for Iranian sovereignty. Among the populous and strategically significant new states, only Turkey, the core of the Ottoman Empire and the main beneficiary of the nineteenth-century reforms, was able to definitively defy the imposed peace settlement and pursue its own foreign and domestic policies from the early 1920s to the end of World War II.

The interwar era in the Arab territories was a period of Anglo-French dominance. Britain retained control in Egypt, and the League of Nations sanctioned the division of the former Ottoman Arab provinces into new states and granted Britain and France the right to administer them as mandates. According to the patronizing language of the League's covenant, mandates "were inhabited by peoples not yet able to stand by themselves under the strenuous conditions of the modern world." They were to be under the tutelage of the "advanced nations," which would assist them "until such time as they are able to stand alone." It was thus the responsibility of the mandatory powers to prepare these regions for self-government. With such phrasing, the League attempted to gloss over the fact that mandates were simply another name for imperial control. The mandate system allowed Britain and France to secure their strategic interests in the Middle East while paying lip service to the widely publicized principle of self-determination. However, the mandate system differed from prewar imperialism in that the mandatory power was responsible for preparing its charges for self-government and was thus bound to terminate its control at some unspecified time.

For most of the interwar period, Arab political activity was primarily devoted to achieving independence from foreign control. Other considerations, such as land reform or social welfare legislation, received comparatively little attention. One reason for this focus on gaining sovereignty was that the Arab political leaders of the interwar period came mainly from the established landed or professional classes. The war years had not produced a social upheaval, and the same elite who had enjoyed power and prestige before 1914—the European-educated landed and professional classes in Egypt and the traditional notables in Syria, Lebanon, and Palestine—continued to exercise their privileges during the 1920s and 1930s. Iraq was perhaps an exception to this pattern, but even in Baghdad, the political elite was drawn largely from former Ottoman military officers who upheld the tradition of Ottoman ruling-class behavior. These ruling groups sought to maintain their local bases of support while heading the campaign against Britain or France. This necessitated occasional compromises. Local political leaders in a situation of foreign imperial control were dependent for their positions on the goodwill of the occupying power. Thus, even as the Arab political leaders demanded independence, they tried to remain in the European authorities' good graces. They practiced the politics of the notables in a new setting.

The replacement of the Ottoman political order with separate states forced wrenching economic and ideological readjustments upon the region's inhabitants. What had once been an integrated economic unit under a single imperial authority was parceled into fragments. Each new Arab state had its own tariff and customs regulations, its own currency, and its own form of economic ties with its European overlord. Patterns of commercial exchange were also altered as the new frontiers cut off cities such as Aleppo, which had been the entry point for produce from the Anatolian hinterland, from their sources of supply. Conflicting ideological appeals competed for the loyalties of the Arab population. As the rulers of each emergent state endeavored to create specific symbols of national identity, advocates of Pan-Arab unity or Islamic solidarity condemned the imposed fragmentation of the Arab world and called upon the rulers to renounce their local power in favor of a larger confederation. And throughout the interwar and World War II years, a new issue—Zionist immigration into Palestine—added to the confusion and tensions created by the end of the Ottoman order.

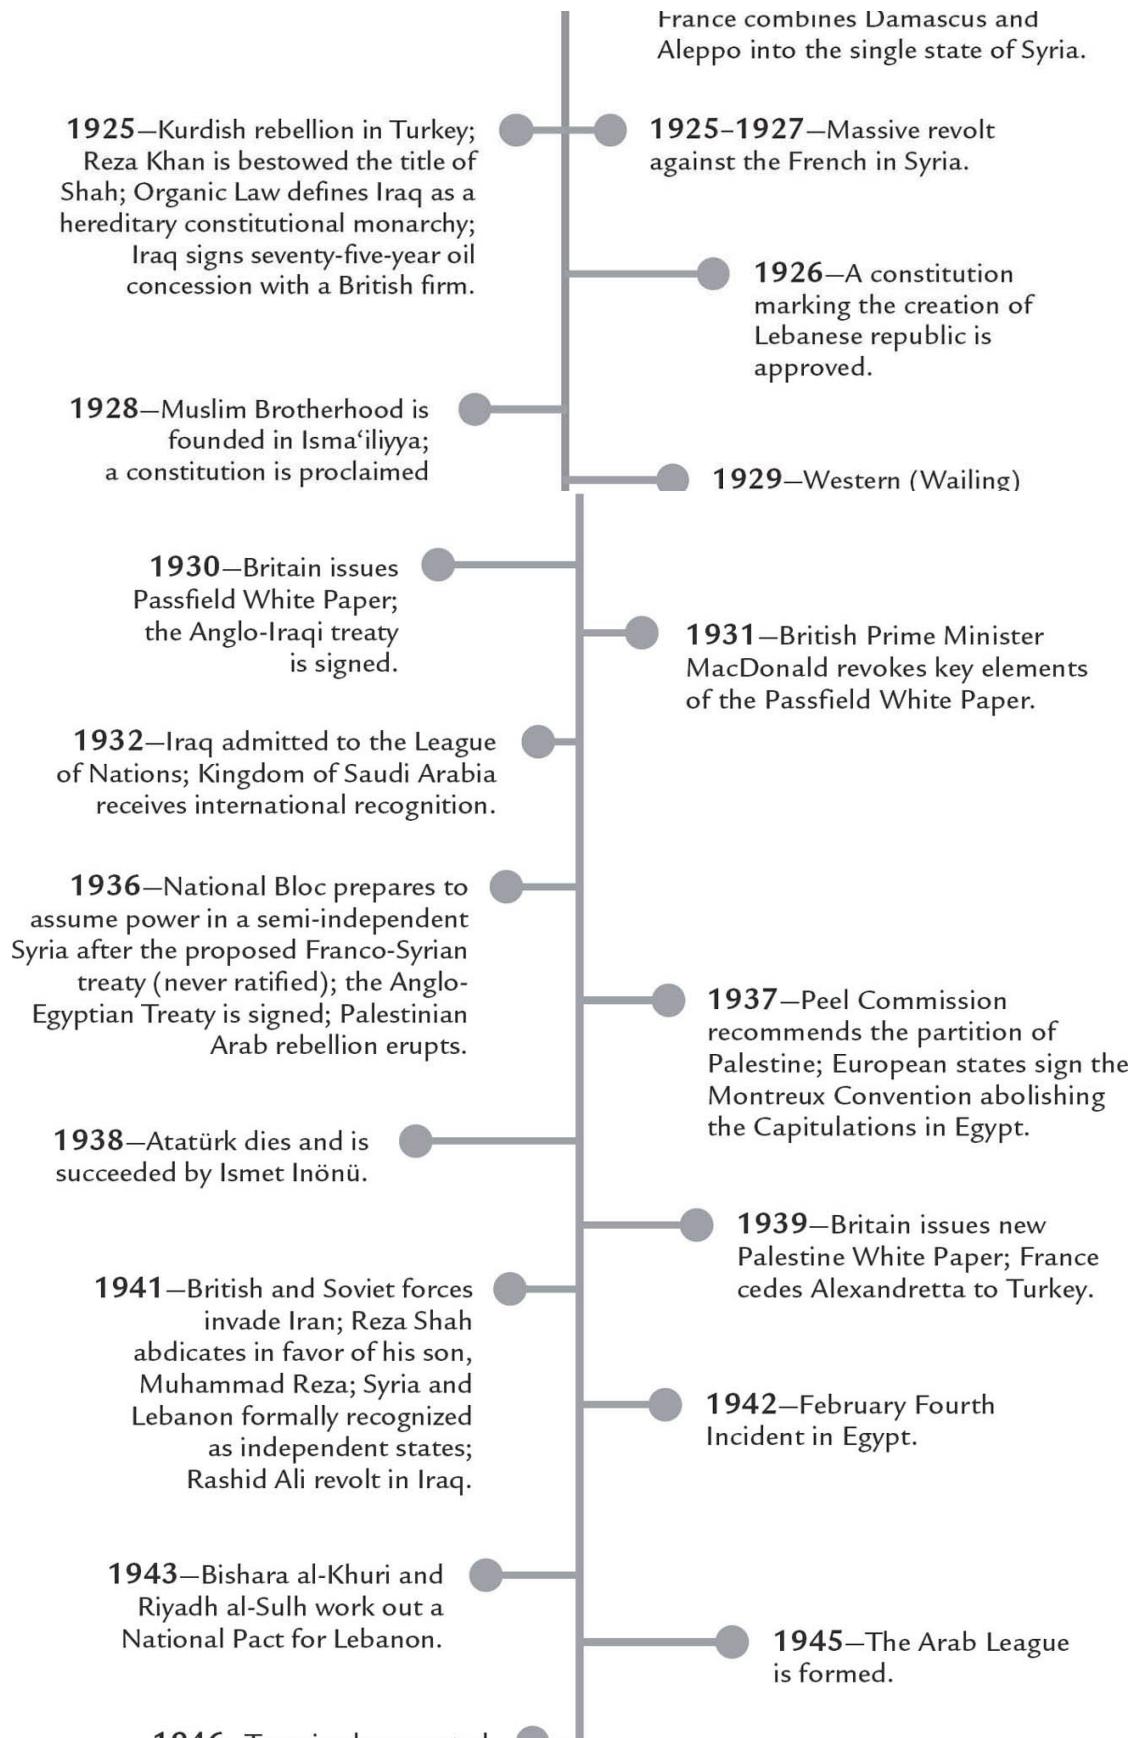

Just as World War I served to loosen the grip of the Ottoman Empire on its Arab provinces, so World War II hastened the end of Anglo-French dominance in the Middle East and led to the granting of official independence to all the major states of the region. Although neither Britain nor France surrendered its imperial aspirations easily or completely, the war had so weakened them that they could no longer sustain the overseas commitments required for empires.

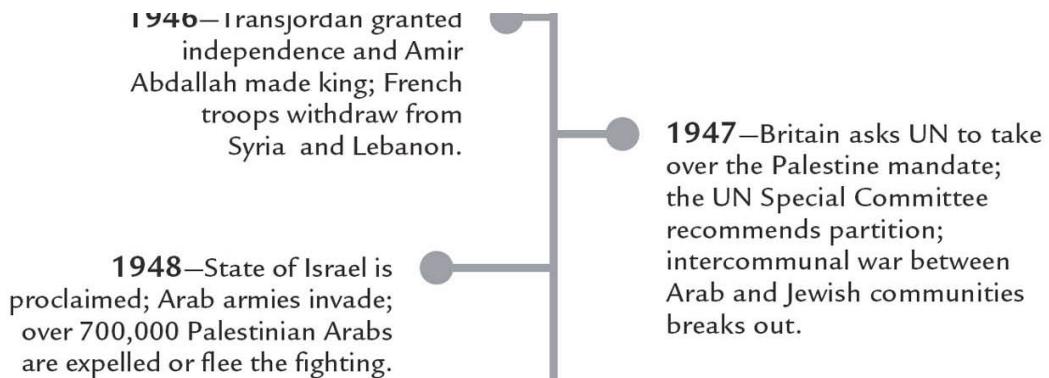

Yet if the end of World War II brought independence to the Middle East, it was one clouded with uncertainties arising out of the embittered ending to the Palestine mandate. In the immediate aftermath of the war, the question of Palestine became especially urgent. The revelation of the horror of the German concentration camps and the existence of thousands of displaced Jewish refugees made the Zionists more determined than ever to establish a state in which Jews would be secure. The creation of Israel in the war of 1948 represented the achievement of the Zionist objective. However, it also represented failure on the part of the Arab regimes that had resisted Israel's formation. The events of 1948 had shaken the leaders of those regimes, and they entered the era of independence discredited and vulnerable to the currents of discontent their policies had spawned.

KEY EVENTS: THE STRUGGLE FOR INDEPENDENCE: THE INTERWAR ERA TO THE END OF WORLD WAR II

CHAPTER 10

AUTHORITARIAN REFORM IN TURKEY AND IRAN

In the years immediately following World War I, both Turkey and Iran cast out their existing monarchies and embarked on vigorous programs of state-sponsored reform. In Turkey, the new policies were carried out under the auspices of a republican form of government within which presidential authority was dominant. Although President Atatürk acquired virtual dictatorial powers, he was legally elected, and he attempted to implant in Turkey the institutions and attitudes that would enable full-fledged democracy to flourish under his successors. In Iran, the Qajar dynasty was replaced by the Pahlavis in the person of Reza Shah, a former officer in the Cossack Brigade who seized the royal crown and placed it on his own head. This military officer and self-proclaimed shah continued the absolutist traditions of the Iranian monarchy and sought to ensure the hereditary succession of his son. Both Atatürk and Reza Shah promoted an unprecedented degree of secularism in public life, and both tried to buttress their reforms by the promulgation of new symbols of national identity. In doing so, they attempted to separate the institutions of the state from those of religion and thus to create a primary loyalty to the nation and its emerging secular structures.

THE ATATÜRK ERA IN TURKEY

Postwar Partition, the Greek Invasion, and the War of Independence

By the end of 1918, the victorious Allies controlled Istanbul and the Ottoman government. The CUP leaders had fled the country, and such imperial governmental authority as existed was exercised by the sultan, Mehmet VI Vahideddin, who dismissed the Ottoman parliament in December 1918 and thereafter ruled by decree. In the opinion of the sultan and his closest advisers, cooperation with the Allies was the policy most likely to salvage some morsel of independent Ottoman territory in the postwar settlements. This stance opened the sultan's government to charges of collaboration with the foreign invaders.

The Allies were determined to punish the Ottomans as a defeated power, to grant the demands for self-determination put forward by Christian subjects of the empire, and to secure their own strategic objectives in Anatolia. These goals were incorporated into the Treaty of Sèvres in 1920 (see Map 9.2). Although we examined the terms of the treaty in Chapter 9, they deserve to be repeated here: Italy and France were to divide southwestern Anatolia between them; an independent Armenian state, centered around Erzurum, was to be created; and Greece was to receive territory in Thrace that would bring its borders within twenty-five miles (forty kilometers) of Istanbul. In addition, Greece was awarded the right to administer the port city of Izmir and its adjacent regions. Even in the limited territory left to it by the Treaty of Sèvres, the Ottoman government's sovereignty was severely restricted: An Allied commission was to administer the Turkish Straits; the finances of the government were placed under Allied control; and the hated Capitulations, abolished by the CUP at the start of the war, were restored. But the Istanbul government, in its desperation not to lose everything, signed the treaty.

Even before the treaty was signed, however, events were under way in Anatolia that would render it null and void. Local Turkish resistance groups, calling themselves societies for the defense of rights, rose up to oppose the occupation and division of Turkish soil. This spontaneous resistance, consisting of volunteer militia units and roving guerrilla bands, took on the aura of a national war for independence with the arrival in 1919 of three experienced Ottoman field commanders who assumed the task of organizing the forces. One of these commanders, Mustafa Kemal, gradually asserted his leadership of the emerging national movement. The sultan's government dismissed him from service when it learned of his activities, and Kemal became a rebel army officer, acting against the policies of the legally constituted government in Istanbul. But he was not alone—other Ottoman commanders accepted his authority and joined his cause, redefined as the preservation of Turkish national independence. The act that unified the resistance forces and made the Turkish population of Anatolia aware of the danger facing it was the Greek invasion of Anatolia.

In the course of the Allied negotiating sessions, Greece's prime minister, Eleutherios Venizelos, persuaded the Allies to support the establishment of a Greek presence in Izmir and its environs. An Allied squadron landed an entire Greek division in Izmir on May 14, 1919. The Greek forces quickly secured the city and then embarked on a brutal campaign, marked by atrocities against Turkish noncombatants and the desecration of mosques, to bring a large portion of Izmir's hinterland under their control. By 1921, the Greeks had captured the former Ottoman capital of Bursa and penetrated so deeply into Anatolia that they posed a threat to Kemal's fledgling national movement.

For his part, Kemal attempted to broaden the resistance's base and to devise a means by which the nationalists could replace the Istanbul government as the legitimate representative of the Turkish people. His efforts resulted in the convening of a body of representatives in Ankara in spring 1920. Composed of delegates chosen by local resistance groups throughout Anatolia and Thrace and also including several members of the dissolved Ottoman parliament, this body called itself the grand national assembly. On April 23, 1920, the deputies agreed to form a government with Mustafa Kemal as its president. The assembly justified its actions on the grounds that foreign occupiers controlled the Istanbul government and it no longer represented the Turkish people. Adopting principles of popular sovereignty, the assembly asserted that the national will was embodied in the delegates gathered in Ankara. In January 1921 the assembly adopted a constitution that contained the National Pact, which has formed the basis of Turkish foreign policy ever since. Renouncing any territorial claims to the former Arab provinces, the National Pact affirmed the right of full Turkish sovereignty over the remaining portions of the empire inhabited by a Turkish majority.

As far as Mustafa Kemal and the national assembly were concerned, the right of full Turkish sovereignty extended to the portion of Anatolia awarded to the new Armenian republic in the Treaty of Sèvres. The first organized gathering of the Turkish nationalist movement (the Congress of Erzurum, 1919) passed a resolution stating that no privileges that might impair Turkey's political sovereignty would be granted to the Christians. The existence of an Armenian state was regarded as such an impairment. In fall 1920, Turkey and the Soviet Union invaded Armenia and divided its territory between them, an act that marked the first stage in the dismantling of the Treaty of Sèvres. In the process of dividing Armenia, Turkey and the Soviet Union established cordial relations with one another, freeing the nationalists from concerns over Soviet intentions and enabling them to concentrate their forces against the Greeks.

The year 1921 was a turning point for the nationalists. Both the Soviet Union and France recognized Ankara as the legitimate government of Turkey, and Italy agreed to withdraw its forces from southern Anatolia. In the meantime, the resistance forces were being molded into a national army in Ankara. With Mustafa Kemal assuming full command of military operations, the Turkish forces turned back the Greeks during the three-week battle of Sakarya in August and September. When the campaign resumed the following year, it quickly turned into a rout, and the Greek army fled back toward Izmir. Kemal's forces entered the city in September 1922 and then headed north for Istanbul, where the Allied garrisons were stationed. Kemal was determined to enforce the terms of the National Pact—full Turkish sovereignty—even if it meant engaging the British troops in combat. However, both sides agreed to negotiations, and on October 11, 1922, Turkey, Greece, and Britain signed the Armistice of Mudanya, which arranged for the withdrawal of the Greek armed forces and called for a peace conference to renegotiate the terms of the Treaty of Sèvres.

The preliminaries to the conference brought a final resolution to the problem of the existence of two Turkish governments. The British invited both Ankara and Istanbul to send representatives to the forthcoming negotiations. Kemal used this as an excuse to bring before the assembly legislation that would abolish the sultanate and turn the caliphate into a religious office with no political authority. Although some deputies opposed this proposal, Kemal bent them to his will, and on November 1, 1922, the assembly passed a resolution that separated the caliphate from the sultanate and eliminated the sultanate. Mehmet VI Vahideddin, the thirty-sixth and last sultan of the line stretching back six centuries to Osman, left Istanbul under British protection. The assembly then designated his cousin, Abdul Mejid, as caliph. The abolition of the sultanate represented the end of the Ottoman political era, and the selection of the caliph of Islam by a democratically elected body of national delegates marked the beginning of the Turkish one.

When the Lausanne Conference convened in late 1922, Ankara was represented by Ismet Inönü, whose performance has become a classic in the annals of international diplomacy. Partially deaf, Inönü simply turned off his hearing aid when the chairman of the conference, British foreign secretary Lord Curzon, launched into lengthy speeches against the Turkish demands. Once Curzon had completed his objections, Inönü restated his original insistence on recognition of the National Pact as though the British foreign secretary had never uttered a word.

Although Inönü's stubbornness exasperated the delegates, it helped ensure success for Ankara's position. When the Treaty of Lausanne was finally signed on July 24, 1923, Turkish sovereignty was recognized over all areas claimed by the National Pact with the exception of Mosul in northern Iraq. This was a remarkable turnaround for the Anatolian portion of the Ottoman Empire. It emerged from being partitioned and occupied in 1920 as the internationally recognized independent nation-state of Turkey three years later, free of restrictions on its domestic policies, its finances (except for the continuing obligation incurred by loans taken out in the nineteenth century), and its jurisdiction over foreign nationals. A new nation had been forged in the crucible of a national war of independence. The one area where sovereignty was limited was the Turkish Straits, which remained under international supervision until 1936, when full Turkish control was recognized. A separate agreement between Greece and Turkey arranged for the forced exchange of populations between the two states. In an operation that caused severe hardships to those involved, about 1.3 million Greeks living within Turkey were transported to Greece and about 400,000 Turks were uprooted from Greece and resettled in Turkey. The age of nationalism had arrived with a vengeance.

The Reforms of the Atatürk Era

With independence firmly established, it was possible to concentrate on shaping the institutions of the new Turkish state. The forceful leadership of Mustafa Kemal, known as Atatürk, determined in large measure the Westernizing direction and rapid pace of the reforms. His surname, meaning father of the Turks, was bestowed on him by the national assembly in 1935. Born into modest circumstances in Salonika in 1881, Atatürk attended the military preparatory school in his native city and went on to graduate from the Imperial War College in Istanbul. He was involved with the CUP movement against Abdul Hamid but disassociated himself from the political intrigues and repressive policies of the Young Turk regime. His direct experience of Europe was limited to brief postings as a military attaché in Sofia and Berlin. During World War I, he served with great distinction at Gallipoli and on the eastern and Syrian fronts; his leadership in the war of independence further enhanced his prestige. A fervent admirer of European institutions and attitudes, he was determined to mold the new Turkey in the image of the West.

The first task facing his government after Lausanne was to determine the political and administrative character of the state. In an immediate break with the Ottoman past, the capital of the country was transferred from Istanbul to Ankara in 1923. This move of the government from the cosmopolitan capital of the former empire to the heartland of Anatolia symbolized the Turkishness of the new state. In the following year, a new constitution was passed in which the principles of republicanism and popular sovereignty were reaffirmed. All males eighteen and over were given the right to vote; their sovereign will was exercised through the grand national assembly. The assembly chose the president of the republic from among its members. Atatürk held this office until his death in 1938. Throughout most of Atatürk's presidency, his comrade at arms Ismet İnönü served as prime minister. The political instrument through which Atatürk ruled was the Republican People's Party (RPP), the sole party in the state.

The president was able to acquire enormous power within the framework of democracy because of his control of the RPP and, through it, of the assembly. An important legacy of this early organizational phase was the civilianization of political life. In 1924, the assembly, following Atatürk's example, passed a law requiring that all military personnel wishing to stand for public office would have to resign their commissions.

Once the essential mechanisms of government were established, Atatürk led Turkey through an intensive period of reform designed to root out the Ottoman past and replace it with a Western orientation in all areas of national life. As innovative as some of the reforms appeared to be, they were largely a continuation of the transformation begun in the nineteenth century. Atatürk was himself a product of the Ottoman reform era, and much of the legislation adopted during his presidency had its origins in the preceding decades. Though the intensity of change was heightened under Atatürk, the process of change itself was not new and should be viewed in the context of a historical pattern that extended from Sultan Mahmud II through the Tanzimat and Young Turk eras. The reforms can be examined through the six principles Atatürk designated as the foundations of the doctrine known as Kemalism: reformism, republicanism, secularism, nationalism, populism, and etatism. Reformism pervaded the entire Atatürk era; it stood for an openness to innovation and the acceptance of nonviolent change. The second principle, republicanism, was, as we have seen, made part of the fabric of the Turkish state from its very beginnings. This contained antecedents dating from the Ottoman era, but the constitutions of the empire and of the republic differed markedly in their emphasis on popular sovereignty.

Secularism was a central element in Atatürk's platform, and the impatient Westernizer's thorough pursuit of it is unparalleled in modern Islamic history. The policy was inaugurated when the grand national assembly voted in March 1924 to depose Caliph Abdul Mejid, to abolish the caliphate, and to banish from Turkey all members of the Ottoman royal family—in effect sweeping aside thirteen centuries of accumulated Islamic tradition. Other secularizing legislation quickly followed. The office of shaykh al-Islam was abolished, the religious schools were closed, and the Ministry of Religious Endowments was eliminated. In 1926, the assembly went much further and voted to abolish the Mejelle and the shari'ah. In their place, the Swiss civil code was adopted, along with penal and commercial codes modeled on Italian and German examples. This was a direct break with the past. Even with the new legal codes of the Tanzimat and Young Turk eras, the civil code—which included family law—continued to be based on the shari'ah. But with the legislation of 1926, secular European laws replaced the laws of God in all spheres of human relationships. The new civil code forbade polygamy and broadened the grounds by which wives could seek divorce. As a result of these reform measures, the ulama lost the final vestiges of their role in affairs of state, and their numbers declined.

Secularism affected not only official institutions but also the religious practices of the Turkish people. The Sufi orders were dissolved, and worship at tombs and shrines was prohibited by law. Atatürk launched a personal attack on the fez, the brimless headgear that enabled a worshiper to touch his forehead to the ground during prayer. To Atatürk, the fez symbolized a tie to the Ottoman past, and he was determined to force its abandonment. In summer 1925, the president took to wearing a panama hat during his public appearances, explaining that hats were the headgear of civilized nations. In November, the assembly endorsed the president's practice and passed a law that made it a criminal offense to wear a fez. Hats became a prime symbol of Turkey's drive to Westernize. Other measures of Europeanization included the replacement of the Muslim lunar calendar with the Gregorian and the adoption of Sunday in place of Friday as the weekly day of rest. One of the most controversial acts of secularization involved the translation of the Quran. Because the divine revelations were in Arabic, translations were prohibited, for they were seen as tampering with the direct word of God. But Atatürk commissioned a translation of the Quran into Turkish and had it read publicly in 1932. In the same year, legislation made obligatory the issuing of the call to prayer in Turkish instead of Arabic. Unlike the Tanzimat reforms, which allowed for a certain dualism, Atatürk's programs did not leave traditional institutions intact.

Although Atatürk made secularism a central feature of his reform program, his intentions may not have embraced the full meaning of that word. Atatürk's goal was to reduce Islamic organizations' influence on political and social life and to redirect popular loyalties toward symbols of nation and state. He sought not to abolish Islam as a personal belief system but rather to remove it as an institutionalized regulating agent in the affairs of state and society. His program was "secular" in that it envisaged the development of a civil society constructed on human, not divine, legislation but still allowed for religious observance. The impact of secularism was most pronounced in the urban centers, for in rural areas, Turks found ways to evade the laws and to participate in Sufi rituals and to practice forms of folk Islam that were technically forbidden.

Two additional principles of Atatürk's platform, nationalism and populism, had overlapping objectives. Nationalism involved creating pride in Turkishness and promoting symbols of cultural identity for the new state. With this in mind, Atatürk introduced a policy of language reform that had far-reaching consequences. He ordered a commission to develop a phonetic Turkish alphabet using the Latin alphabet in place of the existing Arabic one. The new alphabet was revealed in 1928, and its public use was made compulsory the following year. Atatürk was not worried, as some were, that adopting the new alphabet would cut the younger generation off from access to the rich heritage of Ottoman literature—that was precisely his aim.

Atatürk also encouraged the development of a nationalist orientation in historical studies. The Turkish Historical Society, founded in 1925, publicized the notion that the Turks were one of the world's preeminent peoples before their association with Islam and the Ottoman Empire. The Turkish nationalist interpretation of history was joined to some rather extreme theories of linguistic nationalism, one of which, the sun letter theory, propounded the idea that Turkish was the first spoken language of the human race. Such ideas, stressing purely Turkish accomplishments, were designed to overcome the pejorative connotations that had been associated with the term Turk during the Ottoman period.

Atatürk's efforts to forge a uniform Turkish national identity left no room for cultural pluralism and caused him at times to strain the institutions of republicanism. This is evident in his response to the widespread Kurdish rebellion that lasted for several months in 1925. The rebellion was inspired by a mixture of Kurdish nationalism and Islamic revivalism, two sentiments that were anathema to Atatürk. He persuaded the assembly to pass a law for the maintenance of order that granted the government extraordinary power for two years. Using the latitude provided by the new law, the government established special independence tribunals that were empowered to prosecute and sentence the rebels. When the Kurdish rebellion was crushed in late 1925, the leader and forty-six of his followers were executed by order of one of the tribunals. Neither Atatürk nor his successors were prepared to acknowledge the ethnic and cultural distinctiveness of the

Kurdish minority, and the government officially referred to them as “mountain Turks.”

Populism was embodied in the establishment of “people’s houses” throughout the country. A combination of adult education centers, sports clubs, and political indoctrination units, the people’s houses were the outcome of the government’s efforts to take the revolution to the masses. As well as offering recreational facilities, they provided forums for government representatives to explain the new legislation and to promote the cause of Turkish solidarity. They also served a political function. The people’s houses were managed by Atatürk’s RPP and were used to generate support for the president and his reformist programs. Although a certain element of total state control was inherent in this organizational interconnection, the people’s houses were instrumental in establishing the principle of popular participation in government.

Populism and nationalism were further combined in a massive program of educational expansion. Atatürk strongly believed in forming an educated cadre of Turks committed to his reforms so they could capably administer them after his passing. In addition, because sovereignty now rested with the people, it was important to develop a literate and informed public. Although the battle against illiteracy, especially in the rural areas, was long and difficult, Atatürk broke away from the elitist educational tradition of the Ottoman era and established the principle of free and compulsory elementary education. Between 1923 and 1940, the number of schools in the country doubled, the number of teachers increased by 133 percent, and the number of students increased by nearly 300 percent.¹

The entire corpus of reformist legislation affected the status of women. Although the practice of veiling was not directly addressed, the reforming tendency of the state created an environment leading toward greater equality between the sexes. Atatürk was fond of the company of emancipated women and encouraged Turkish women to acquire the social graces of Europeans. In what might be regarded as a step in this direction, if hardly qualifying as progress by today’s standards, beauty pageants were introduced into Turkey, and in 1932, a Turk was crowned Miss Europe. More substantive advances were provided by the adoption of universal education, which enabled women to acquire the training necessary to enter public life. By 1933, there were thirteen female judges in Turkey. In 1934, women were given the right to vote for, and to stand as, candidates for the national assembly; the 1935 elections returned seventeen female delegates to the assembly.

The final Kemalist principle, etatism, was developed in the 1930s. During the early years of the Atatürk revolution, economic policy was not a high priority. However, with the onset of the worldwide depression in the 1930s, Turkish planners concluded that the country would have to become less dependent on imports and that this could be achieved through the development of an industrial base. Local private capital was insufficient for this purpose, so the government decided to intervene directly in the economy and to divert state funds to the construction of major projects. Etatism, usually defined as state capitalism, began with the announcement of a five-year plan in 1933. Over the course of the plan, large-scale textile and steel plants were constructed along with such light industries as paper, glass, and cement factories. Although etatism provided Turkey with a modest industrial infrastructure that it might not otherwise have acquired, the location of the plants was often ill conceived and the operation of some of the factories was inefficient. More serious was the neglect of agricultural development that marked the Atatürk years. Mechanization was limited, productivity rose only marginally, and rural standards of living remained low. Etatism was not a resounding success.

Turkey's foreign relations during Atatürk's presidency were excellent, fostering an extended period of peace in which Turkish leaders could focus on domestic issues. Turkish nationalism concentrated on building internal solidarity and was not expansionist. Atatürk repeatedly renounced any intent of seeking the recovery of former Ottoman territory outside the National Pact boundaries, and he disavowed the Pan-Turkish schemes propounded by some intellectuals and politicians. Turkey was admitted to the League of Nations in 1932 and joined the Balkan Pact in 1934, a sign that workable relations had been reestablished between Ankara and the nations over which the Ottomans once ruled. Because of Atatürk's restrained foreign policy, Turkey exerted little influence in the capitals of the Arab successor states. The most contentious regional issue during the interwar years involved a dispute with France over the Alexandretta peninsula, an area of mixed Arab and Turkish population that had been under French administration since 1921. Atatürk believed that Alexandretta was a predominantly Turkish region (a disputable assumption), thus he contested France's decision to include it as part of a proposed independent Syrian state in 1936. The matter then became the subject of continuous negotiation until 1939, when France agreed to the Turkish annexation of Alexandretta, much to the Syrians' annoyance (see Map 12.2).

The inauguration of the debate over Alexandretta was Atatürk's last decisive act as president. He died in November 1938 at the age of fifty-seven. His passing was deeply mourned. He was an inspired and inspirational leader, one of those rare figures whose exceptional talents were available to meet a challenge to which they were perfectly suited. A member of the Ottoman military elite whose reputation was established on the battlefields of World War I and the war for independence, he renounced grandiose schemes of glory and accepted the less rewarding task of pragmatic nation building. He used his immense presidential powers to establish respect for the law and to lay the groundwork for popular participation in government. To be sure, his reforms were too abrupt for some, and his creation of a state that sought to regulate individuals' lives more directly than had the Ottomans caused resentment and occasionally led to resistance. His sweeping secular measures, which attempted to cut the Turks off from their Islamic past and to sever their ties with the rest of the Islamic world, alienated segments of the population, especially in the rural areas. And his goal of remaking Turkey in the image of Europe offended certain quarters; he was not a selective reformer but a committed Westernizer. The authoritarian features of Atatürk's republic aroused suspicions in the West, but the democratic institutions he established have endured. Perhaps his most important legacy was the smooth transition of power to his successor, Ismet İnönü, who came to the presidency in 1938 determined to further the principles of Kemalism.

IRAN UNDER REZA SHAH

From the End of the War to the Consolidation of the Pahlavi Dynasty

The events of World War I further weakened the authority of Iran's central government, compromised the state's sovereignty, and devastated its economy. Although the Qajar ruler, Ahmad Shah, presided over his court in Tehran, real authority in the country was exercised by the two occupying powers, Britain in the south and Russia in the north. The Russian threat was temporarily removed with the withdrawal of Russian troops in the aftermath of the revolution of 1917. The limitations that the presence of foreign armies placed on the authority of the central government were considerable and contributed to a renewed wave of tribalism and to the rise of a series of provincial political movements aimed not so much at separation from Tehran as at reducing the foreign influence that pervaded the country.

From 1918 until 1921, Britain, determined to protect its oil interests and to contain the new threat of Bolshevism, increased its already prominent role in Iranian affairs. British subsidies kept the government in Tehran afloat, and British military and administrative advisers attempted to reorganize what was left of Iran's army and to manipulate the various political factions within the country to Britain's advantage. When Britain offered to grant Iran a loan in exchange for exclusive advisory privileges, antiforeign demonstrations broke out in several cities and added to the widespread discontent with the government, which was seen as ineffective and pro-British. This chaotic situation was finally brought to an end by the actions of a determined military commander.

On February 21, 1921, Reza Khan, a colonel in the Cossack Brigade, led a contingent of 3,000 men into Tehran, arrested a number of prominent politicians, and requested that the shah appoint a young civilian reformer, Sayyid Zia Tabatabai, as prime minister. The shah agreed, and Sayyid Zia formed a new cabinet and named Reza Khan to the post of army commander. In May, Reza Khan forced Sayyid Zia to resign and, over the next four years, consolidated more and more power into his own hands. The Majlis, recognizing the urgent need to restore order to the countryside, authorized huge budget increases for the armed forces. Reza Khan used these resources to enlarge the military, modernize its weaponry, and send it on relentless campaigns against the tribal rebellions. By 1925, the major areas of dissidence had been subdued, and Reza Khan had become a respected, if not beloved, national figure.

Nor was his authority confined to the military sphere. In 1923, Reza Khan assumed the office of prime minister, then suggested to Ahmad Shah that the monarch might enjoy a European vacation. The shah understood the thinly veiled threat and left Tehran for Paris, never to return. Two years later, Reza Khan persuaded the Majlis to depose the Qajar dynasty and to convene a constituent assembly. In a 1925 meeting, it voted to entrust the crown of the oldest monarchy on earth to Reza Khan's family. Another local military commander had become king of kings, and in 1926, the Pahlavi dynasty began. It would last but fifty-three years.

The Reign of Reza Shah, 1926–1941

Although Reza Shah never articulated his goals with the clarity of Atatürk, his reforms were intended to accomplish in Iran results similar to those that Atatürk was achieving in Turkey. Indeed, Reza Shah borrowed many of his programs directly from the Kemalist experience. The two rulers have often been likened, but Reza Shah's background and political attitudes were more akin to those of Muhammad Ali of nineteenth-century Egypt than to Atatürk's. Born to a Turkish-speaking family in the Caspian province of Mazandaran in 1878, Reza Shah had a limited education and joined the Cossack Brigade at an early age. He may have known some Russian, but he was unschooled in any European language and rose through the ranks to become a colonel. His unusual height and proud bearing endowed him with a commanding presence and made him a successful officer and a formidable autocrat.

He is rightly regarded as a reformer, but his reforms were selective and not intended to restructure the existing political order. Although elections to the Majlis were held regularly, Reza Shah's manipulation rendered them meaningless. He controlled the entire political system and reduced the Majlis to a rubber stamp for his legislation. Rather than revising the constitution, he left it in place and simply ignored it when that suited his purpose. His personal power was enforced by the use of censorship, the abolition of opposition parties, the banning of trade unions, and the arrest and occasional murder of high-ranking officials who incurred his displeasure.

The institutional bases of Reza Shah's authority rested with his control of the army and the bureaucracy and his skillful use of court patronage. In 1926, the Majlis passed a universal conscription law that required every Iranian male to serve for two years in the armed forces. The shah used this legislation to build up a military force of more than 100,000 that included armored brigades, an air force, and a navy. He emphasized his close personal relationship to the armed forces and effectively catered to the officer corps, providing them with high salaries, a sumptuous club in Tehran, and the opportunity to purchase land at reduced prices. In the civilian sphere, Reza Shah's centralizing policies led to a rapid expansion of the state bureaucracy and thus to the creation of a cadre of civil servants dependent for their positions on the Pahlavi regime's continued commitment to reform. A third source of the shah's control over the elite was his ability to dispense court patronage. During the course of his reign, Reza Shah acquired vast private landholdings, the revenues from which he used to establish hotels, casinos, and charitable foundations. Because all of these enterprises required managers and staff, the shah could award such posts to those who were prepared to support his regime.

Although Reza Shah might appear to be a traditional authoritarian monarch in a twentieth-century setting, he was also a reformer committed to strengthening Iran through forced measures of Westernization and centralization. He deployed the army to establish state authority over the tribal leaders with a firmness the Qajars never envisaged. Once the postwar insurrections had been crushed, the shah institutionalized central control by stationing military garrisons in the tribal areas, forcibly disarming the tribes, confiscating their lands, and restricting their migration patterns. These policies achieved the shah's objectives but resulted in the general impoverishment of the tribal population.

As in Turkey, secularism was a central component of Reza Shah's reign. The secularization of state institutions was most marked in the legal and judicial sphere. In 1928, the Majlis voted to adopt a new civil code modeled on that of France. Although the code retained aspects of shari‘ah law in matters of personal status, many of its provisions disregarded the Supplementary Fundamental Laws of 1907 (see Chapter 8), which prohibited the enactment of any laws that contravened the shari‘ah. Reza Shah's legal reforms did not change the supplement; they simply ignored it. The role of the ulama in national judicial life was reduced by the establishment of a hierarchy of state courts in which secular officials replaced the ulama as judges. The state judges were given the power to decide which cases should be referred to the religious courts and which belonged under the jurisdiction of the state courts. The shari‘ah and the shari‘ah judicial system were not directly abolished; rather, they were bypassed through new legislation and confined to increasingly narrow fields of jurisdiction—specifically, to matters of family law. Moreover, the ulama were firmly placed outside the new judicial system by a 1936 law requiring judges in the new state courts to hold a degree from the recently founded Tehran University Faculty of Law or from a foreign university showing that they had undergone at least three years of legal study.

Reza Shah also attacked the financial independence of the religious establishment. A law of 1932 eliminated the ulama’s right to register legal documents, and in 1939, the state announced a seizure of all waqf lands. The powerful Iranian religious establishment was shaken by Reza Shah’s assaults on its position in society, but it was not broken.

Reza Shah’s program of secularism, like Atatürk’s, imposed the outward symbols of Westernization on the population. In 1928, a law was passed that required males to dress in the European manner, and in 1935, the wearing of a hat became compulsory. (In remote villages, expenses were kept to a minimum by the purchase of a single communal fedora, to be worn by whoever was engaged in a venture that might bring him to the attention of the authorities.) Although Reza Shah also introduced legislation regarding women, his policies in this regard were designed more to increase their participation in national life than to improve their legal status. Going even further than Turkey, Iran officially banned the wearing of the veil in 1936, and government employees were encouraged to appear at official receptions with their unveiled wives. Segregation of the sexes in such public places as cafés and cinemas was forbidden as well. Yet women were never granted the right to vote, and the shari‘ah provisions permitting polygamy were retained in the civil code of 1928, as were the established provisions making it easy for men and difficult for women to initiate divorce proceedings.

The most successful reforms occurred in education. Because of Iran’s limited educational development in the nineteenth century, the central government suffered from a shortage of trained administrators in its attempts to accommodate the expanded role Reza Shah demanded of it. The regime endeavored to correct this deficiency by devoting more funds to education. As a result, the number of students enrolled in primary and secondary schools increased dramatically. The government opened an indigenous secular institution of higher learning, Tehran University, in 1935 and each year awarded 100 special government scholarships for study in European universities. The majority of secondary and university graduates entered government service, forming a distinctive bureaucratic class whose members had similar educational backgrounds and possessed shared attitudes toward reform. The religious schools were not abolished as they were in Turkey; in fact, even though the Iranian secondary-level madrasahs experienced an enrollment decline, the religious primary schools had more students at the end of Reza Shah's reign than they did in 1926.

With its vast and rugged terrain and its multitude of ethnic groups, Iran did not readily lend itself to the creation of a uniform national secular culture. However, Reza Shah tried to force one into being. Like Atatürk, he constructed the national symbols of the new Iran around the pre-Islamic achievements of the ancient Iranian empires. The name of the country was officially changed from Persia to Iran so as to emphasize its Aryan origins. The state school curricula fostered the development of patriotic attitudes, and a scouting movement, for both boys and girls, was formed to inculcate nationalistic sentiments among the youth. Reza Shah supported laws that banned the use of minority languages, outlawed ethnic costumes, and reduced the number of Arabic and Turkish words in the Persian language. In addition, the government established the Society of Public Guidance to promote Iranian national sentiment through radio broadcasts and the dissemination of pamphlets and journals.

As Reza Shah guided Iran from the turmoil of the immediate postwar years into a period of stability, the implementation of his programs required an increase in revenue. Reza Shah generated it by collecting taxes more efficiently than the Qajars had done, by raising tariffs on imports, and by introducing indirect taxes on such consumer items as tea, sugar, and tobacco, a practice that was particularly burdensome to the poor. He devoted a large proportion of the state's revenue to improving the country's internal transportation system in an attempt both to encourage domestic trade and to assist the army in maintaining control of outlying areas. The long-delayed trans-Iranian railroad was given a high priority, and in 1938, the route linking the Caspian Sea to the Persian Gulf via Tehran was completed—financed without recourse to foreign loans. As in Turkey, the Great Depression prompted the Iranian state to participate in industrialization projects, including the direct financing of plant construction, the provision of low-interest loans to fledgling local industrialists, and the creation of state monopolies. Although Iran's version of etatism spawned a number of major industrial establishments such as textile mills, sugar refineries, and tea-processing plants, the development process was overly subject to government control and suffered from inefficiencies. Nevertheless, the drive toward industrialization did bring into existence a new wage-earning labor force and changed the character of the major cities, especially Tehran, which grew from a population of 196,000 in 1922 to approximately 700,000 in 1941.

If the urban centers were changing under Reza Shah, the rural areas were not. This was a case not just of neglecting agricultural development but also of directly fostering conditions that strengthened the power of the large landowners over their tenants and depressed the quality of peasant life. The regime introduced measures that permitted landowners to increase their holdings at the expense of peasant proprietors to such an extent that, by the mid-1930s, as much as 95 to 98 percent of the agricultural population was landless.² In part, these practices were designed to assist the shah in his drive to become an accepted member of the landed aristocracy. Although he dispossessed certain leading families, he courted others by offering them posts in the government and ensuring their election to the Majlis. Through confiscations and direct seizures, the former Cossack Brigade officer became the largest landowner in the country, and he attempted to cement his ties to the landed aristocracy by making one of their members his third wife and marrying his daughter to another. In these circumstances the relationship between landlord and tenant remained, as it had been, one of brutal exploitation. There was no populism in Reza Shah's Iran. His regime coerced rural dwellers into adopting European forms of dress; it did not seek to advance their welfare or to encourage their participation in national life.

In general, Reza Shah's efforts to free Iran from the economic bondage in which the Qajars had placed it were successful. However, one foreign enterprise he was unable to control was the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company (AIOC), which functioned as a virtual state within a state in the Persian Gulf province of Khuzistan. The company's influence was all the greater because it was by far the largest industrial employer in the country, with over 30,000 Iranian workers on its payroll. The shah endeavored to renegotiate the infamous D'Arcy concession of 1901 (see Chapter 8), but the company showed no inclination to offer major revisions. After four years of embittered discussions, the parties signed a new agreement in 1933 that provided Iran with a modest increase in the annual royalty payments (from 16 percent to 20 percent of the company's worldwide profits) and the guarantee of a minimum annual payment of £750,000. In return, Iran agreed to extend the concession to 1993 from its scheduled expiration date of 1961. This agreement did little to improve Iran's economic gain from its oil resources or to advance its claims to sovereignty over them; it was to become the source of acrimonious disputes between Iran and Britain in the years after World War II.

Britain's continued dominance in the oil-producing region and its ongoing influence in the south were sources of annoyance to Reza Shah, and he tried to counter them by cultivating diplomatic and commercial ties with Germany. During the late 1930s, Germany became Iran's largest trading partner, and German technicians and agents were active throughout the country. When World War II began, Iran proclaimed its neutrality, but Reza Shah's known pro-German sympathies caused the Soviet Union and Britain to view Iran with suspicion. With the German invasion of the USSR in June 1941, Iran once again became a pawn in the hostilities between outside powers. In order to keep a supply corridor open to the Soviet Union, the British and the Soviets invaded Iran in August. The pampered Iranian army quickly collapsed, the government surrendered on the day after the invasion, and on September 16, 1941, Reza Shah made a desperate attempt to preserve the Pahlavi dynasty by abdicating in favor of his son, Muhammad Reza. The former shah then left Iran under British supervision, eventually settling in South Africa, where he died in 1944. Iran entered World War II just as it had World War I—partitioned and occupied by outside powers.

TURKEY AND IRAN DURING WORLD WAR II: SOVEREIGNTY AND OCCUPATION

If one defines a successful foreign policy as the pursuit of national self-interest, then President Inönü's conduct of Turkish diplomacy during World War II must be judged a triumph. Resisting pressures for an alliance by both the Allies and the Axis, Inönü guided his country along a cautious path of friendly neutrality until the outcome of the war was decided. Finally, on February 23, 1945, less than three months before the armistice, Turkey declared war on Germany, thus qualifying for charter membership in the United Nations.

By contrast, as we have seen, Iran's declaration of neutrality was not respected. British and Soviet forces occupied the country from 1941 to 1946, dividing it into zones of influence resembling those established in 1907. From the Allies' perspective, the occupation of Iran was a routine wartime necessity: Iran produced oil vital to Allied needs, it lay adjacent to other oil-producing regions in the Persian Gulf, and it offered an overland supply route to the beleaguered Soviet Union. However, from the Iranian point of view, the Anglo-Soviet action constituted yet another violation of the country's sovereignty and an insult to its national dignity. The Allied invasion provided postwar Iranian nationalism with a ready-made issue on which to build a case against the intentions of outside powers.

For the duration of the hostilities, Iran was harnessed to the Allied war effort with little regard for the effects this might have on the local economy and social structure. The trans-Iranian railway, which Reza Shah had intended to stand as a symbol of Iranian unity and self-sufficiency, was completely diverted to Allied use. Spending by thousands of foreign occupation troops produced an inflationary spiral that devastated civil servants and others on fixed salaries. Shortages of vital commodities were common and led to hoarding and profiteering by individuals who operated beyond the reach of the government's timid regulatory controls.

When the United States entered the war, it joined the occupying forces by sending thousands of troops to assist in the transport of supplies to the Soviet Union. In addition, US civilian and military personnel assumed influential positions as advisers to the Iranian government and began to direct reforms in such key areas as financial administration, domestic security, and military organization. The groundwork for US involvement in postwar Iranian affairs was thus established.

CONCLUSION

Reza Shah and Atatürk have sometimes been viewed as similar. However, though it is true that many of their state-sponsored reforms were directed toward the same goals, there was a substantial difference between their regimes. Atatürk was an established member of the Ottoman ruling elite who sought to enshrine the principle of popular sovereignty in the new Turkish constitution, whereas Reza Shah was a military usurper whose political objective was to consolidate his own power and to secure his son's succession to the throne. Atatürk controlled Turkey through the Republican People's Party and sowed the seeds from which a popular democratic system took root. His government acquired legitimacy by virtue of its electoral victories, its establishment of the rule of law, and its adherence to the constitutional provisions adopted in 1924. Reza Shah, by contrast, ruled through the army and the institutions of the monarchy. His power was based on coercion rather than consensus, and he chose not to seek the popular mandate that would have given his regime legitimacy. He also ignored the need to establish the political organizations and to foster the political education that would have enabled his reforms to survive his departure. And though Atatürk sought and used power, he did so—and was seen to do so—solely to further his vision of Turkish progress. Reza Shah was also fiercely patriotic, but he was not above using the powers of the monarchy for his personal gain; when he abdicated, his personal bank account had reached the equivalent of £3 million, and his landholdings amounted to over 3 million acres (1.2 million hectares).³ The people viewed him as avaricious and self-serving and applauded his abdication. Thus, although both rulers introduced radical reforms by shock treatment, the legacies they left to the political cultures of their two countries were bound to be different.

CHAPTER 11

THE ARAB STRUGGLE FOR INDEPENDENCE

Egypt, Iraq, and Transjordan from the Interwar Era to 1945

In the immediate aftermath of World War I, Britain's attempts to retain control of Egypt and establish a mandate in Iraq were met with widespread popular resistance. Although Britain managed to crush the revolts in the two countries, the costs were high and could not be sustained. Britain therefore formulated a system of alliance building that has been called empire by treaty. In this system, Egypt and Iraq were granted a limited form of "independence" that provided them with freedom to conduct domestic political affairs as they saw fit yet required the two states to allow the presence of British military bases on their soil and to adopt a foreign policy that was acceptable to Britain. By this means, Britain secured its essential strategic needs without incurring the expenses of directly governing the territories. But the restrictions this system imposed on the full exercise of national sovereignty created a source of conflict between local political leaders and Great Britain and produced continuous tension throughout the period.

THE STRUGGLE FOR POWER IN EGYPT IN THE INTERWAR PERIOD

Although Egypt was spared from becoming a battleground during World War I, its population nevertheless suffered severe hardships in the years 1914–1918. The British decision to make Egypt the launching point for both the Gallipoli and Syrian campaigns meant that the material and human resources of the country were harnessed in service of the Allied war effort. Farm animals and crops were requisitioned and thousands of fellahin conscripted into a civilian labor corps and forced to accompany the British army in its invasion of Ottoman Syria. Rural and urban dwellers alike suffered from the effects of inflation and from shortages of basic consumer goods.

With the British declaration of a protectorate over Egypt and the imposition of martial law in 1914, domestic political activity came to a standstill. The establishment of the British protectorate terminated four centuries of Ottoman sovereignty. Egyptian rulers had long worked to distance themselves from Istanbul's authority, but they had not intended to have the sultan's control replaced by that of the British high commissioner. Nor did Egyptians welcome their forced participation in a war against another Islamic state with which they continued to have strong bonds of religious affinity.

When the war ended, the discontent it had spawned created a simmering restlessness at all levels of Egyptian society. Among the Egyptian elite, strong sentiments for self-government were spurred on by US president Woodrow Wilson's pronouncements on the virtues of self-determination. Yet because the war had shown British policymakers how vital Egypt was to the defense of British imperial interests, there was no likelihood of a voluntary British withdrawal from the country. As Lord Lloyd stated to the House of Commons in 1929, “The only place from which the Suez Canal can be economically and adequately defended is from Cairo.”¹ However, the actions of a few members of the Egyptian elite ignited the existing anti-British feeling into a national uprising that caught the British by surprise and forced them to seek a negotiated agreement for their continued presence in Egypt.

The Formation of the Wafd and the Revolution of 1919

In November 1918 seven prominent Egyptians from the landed gentry and the legal profession formed a delegation, or wafd, whose express goal was the complete independence of Egypt. The delegation approached the British high commissioner with a request that it be allowed to represent Egypt at the Paris Peace Conference. When the request was denied, the wafd organizers took their demands to the Egyptian people. Traveling throughout the country with their message of independence, they sought to rally popular support for their claim that they—and not the British-backed ruler and his ministers—represented the will of the population at large. Thus was founded one of the most widely supported political parties in modern Egyptian history.

The original Wafd Party was led by Sa‘d Zaghlul (circa 1857–1927). Like many of the other party founders, Zaghlul was raised in a rural environment and then went on to acquire a European-style education, in his case a degree from the French law school in Cairo after he had studied at al-Azhar. His was a classic career of upward mobility made possible by the educational and career opportunities provided by Egypt’s transformation; he gained his wealth and status through his work as a Europeanized lawyer, judge, and government administrator, but he owed much of his success as a national political leader to his familiarity with the idiom of the Egyptian countryside and al-Azhar. During the Wafd’s tour of Egypt in early 1919, Zaghlul proved to be a captivating orator and demonstrated a keen ability to communicate with rural Egyptians. He quickly became the focus of popular adulation and, with his colleagues, succeeded in arousing popular discontent over Britain’s refusal to lift the protectorate. The British authorities responded to the Wafd’s campaign by arresting Zaghlul and three other leaders and exiling them to Malta in March 1919.

The exile of Zaghlul unleashed the pent-up emotions of the Egyptian population and created a wave of support for the Wafd. Riots and demonstrations in favor of independence first broke out in urban areas. When the British attempted to contain them by force, the intensity of the demonstrations increased, eventually exploding into a nationwide upheaval known as the revolution of 1919. In Cairo, student demonstrators from the law school and al-Azhar were joined by tram workers and veiled women, all demanding the return of their leader and the independence of their country; lawyers and government workers went on strike, shutting down the courts and the bureaucracy. In the countryside, angry peasants tore up train tracks, burned railcars, and killed British soldiers. The British met the civilian demonstrators with armed force, and by the end of 1919, more than 800 Egyptians had been killed and 1,400 wounded. The situation was eventually defused when the new British high commissioner, General Allenby, decided to allow Zaghlul and his companions to appear before the Paris Peace Conference. The Egyptian people, through their sacrifice, had elevated the Wafd, a group of private citizens, to the role of national representatives.

The Egyptian delegation did not receive a sympathetic hearing in Paris, but the British decided to include Zaghlul in discussions on the future of the Anglo-Egyptian relationship. The negotiations dragged on for two years, largely because the Wafd demanded full and complete independence, whereas the British insisted on imposing conditions that would restrict Egyptian sovereignty. The deadlock was finally broken not by agreement between the two parties but by the unilateral declaration of independence Britain issued in 1922. The declaration abolished the protectorate, proclaimed Egypt independent, and elevated the status of the Egyptian ruler to king. However, the declaration also contained four reserved points that made a mockery of the term independence. The British government would remain responsible for the security of imperial communications in Egypt, the defense of Egypt against foreign aggression or interference, the protection of foreign interests and foreign minorities in Egypt, and the Sudan and its future status. The British military presence in Egypt was thus ensured, the Capitulations continued to be enforced, and Egypt still did not control its own foreign policy. The British had imposed their version of independence on Egypt against the will of the Wafd and its popular leader, thereby setting the stage for the confrontations that would define interwar political life in Egypt.

Egypt's Liberal Experiment, 1924–1936

In the minds of the Wafdist politicians, the ideas of independence and constitutional government were closely linked. These wealthy, European-oriented Egyptians assumed that the very existence of a constitution and a parliament would somehow resolve Egypt's domestic problems and hasten British recognition of unfettered independence. Britain supported the constitutional ideal, if not the concept of true independence, and in 1923, a constitution was proclaimed. The first parliamentary elections were held in January 1924, in which the Wafd Party won 90 percent of the seats, allowing Sa‘d Zaghlul to become Egypt’s first elected prime minister. Thus began Egypt’s troubled and short-lived experiment with parliamentary democracy in the interwar period.

Among the many factors that worked against the efficient functioning of Egypt’s democracy, four were particularly debilitating. The first was the nature of the constitution. It awarded extensive powers to the king, including the right to appoint the prime minister and dissolve parliament, and so created an institutionally weak legislature. King Fuad (1917–1936) was determined to protect his royal prerogatives and did not hesitate to dismiss governments whenever it suited his purpose. Second, the British continued to interfere in Egyptian politics, thus undermining the integrity of the parliamentary system. Third, neither the Wafd nor any of the smaller parties adopted the principles of compromise and respect for the opposition that are essential for the proper conduct of parliamentary government. Zaghlul was every bit as authoritarian as the king; he regarded the opposition members of parliament with contempt and stacked the bureaucracy with Wafdist supporters regardless of their qualifications. Finally, the question of Egypt’s independence and the existence of the four reserved points caused political life to revolve around a continuous struggle for power among the Wafd, the monarchy, and the British. The Wafd demanded complete independence and more power for parliament at the expense of the king. King Fuad, in turn, sought to preserve his powers by catering to the British, who tended to support him against the Wafd. The British also supported civilian politicians who were prepared to undertake negotiations on the basis of the four reserved points, something the Wafd would not do.

These factors combined to create short-lived governments interspersed with periods of royal rule. Politics was reduced to a power struggle among competing factions of the elite, and the serious domestic issues facing Egyptian society at large were not addressed. The consuming desire for independence was partially fulfilled in 1936 when Britain, alarmed by Italian expansionism in Ethiopia, agreed to renegotiate the 1922 declaration. The result was an Anglo-Egyptian treaty of alliance that recognized Egypt’s independence, though it also provided for a British military presence in the Suez Canal zone and reaffirmed Britain’s right to defend Egypt in case of attack. Britain, then, retained the advantages of the 1922 declaration. The difference was that an elected Wafdist government signed the 1936 treaty, thus giving formal Egyptian consent to the continued deployment of British troops on Egyptian soil. As a corollary to Egypt's new independence, the European states signed the Montreux Convention (1937), which at long last abolished the Capitulations and provided for the phasing out of the Mixed Courts by 1949.

The achievement of a greater degree of internal sovereignty did not bring about a substantial change in the pattern of Egyptian politics. King Fuad died in 1936 and was succeeded by his son Faruq, a young monarch whose early popularity was gradually eroded by his personal indulgences. The politicians, with their preference for secular political institutions and their self-serving devotion to their own needs, became increasingly isolated from the urban and rural masses. The imported parliamentary system inspired little loyalty from the population, especially as the wealthy professional and landowning politicians who operated it were unwilling to direct their attention to the social legislation Egypt so desperately needed. Nor was there a single national leader capable of inspiring popular confidence. Following Zaghlul's death in 1927, the Wafd, under the leadership of Mustafa al-Nahhas, became factionalized and corrupt. Although it continued to attract a large popular following, it had lost its former élan.

The political leaders' whole-hearted acceptance of European values and their attempts to impose them on Egyptian society further distanced them from the population. One observer has labeled this dimension of the liberal experiment "the attack upon tradition."² It was represented by the diminution of religious values and religious institutions in the regulation of legal affairs and personal relationships. Egyptian society underwent a severe dislocation as liberal leaders endorsed the belief that European civilization, with its supposedly rational foundations, was superior to the divinely ordained Islamic order. Ideas of European origin, ranging from Darwinism to socialism, from feminism to Freudianism, received widespread circulation in the lively periodical press of the era.

For some of the interwar intellectuals and politicians, Egypt's new path toward modernity required a reshaping of its cultural identity. In their eagerness to portray Egypt's cultural legacy as deriving from the liberal traditions of Europe, writers like Taha Husayn (1889–1973), who held an advanced degree from the Sorbonne, downplayed the country's Arab and Islamic heritage in favor of symbols culled from its Greek and pharaonic past. Thus the doctrine of pharaonism glorified the Nile River, the major symbol of Egyptian territorial nationalism, and the rich pre-Islamic civilization to which it had given birth. In his book Mustaqbal al-Thaqafah fi Misr (The Future of Culture in Egypt), published in 1938, Taha Husayn stressed Egypt's Mediterranean heritage and asserted that Egypt had shared in and contributed to the same Greek civilization to which Western Europe owed much of its political and intellectual strength. Such deliberate omission of Islam further alienated the population from the parliamentary regime and the politicians and intellectuals who claimed to speak for the people but ignored their economic grievances and insulted their Islamic sensibilities.

The attack upon tradition was also evident in the emergence of an Egyptian feminist movement. Originating among women from Cairo's upper classes, Egyptian feminism coalesced around the leadership of Huda Sha'rawi (1879–1947) and the Egyptian Feminist Union she founded in 1923. The union initially focused on such issues as women's suffrage, equal access to educational opportunities, and the reform of marriage laws. The union supported complete independence from Britain but, like the upper-class male leaders of the Wafd Party, promoted European social values and had an essentially secular orientation. The objectives of the feminist movement were symbolized by the well-publicized gesture of social freedom made by Sha'rawi and her associate, Saiza Nabrawi, who removed their veils as they stepped off a train at Cairo's main railway station in 1923. Some of the Egyptian Feminist Union's educational demands were met: In 1925, the government made primary education compulsory for girls as well as boys, and later in the decade, women were admitted to the national university for the first time. The union's campaign for the reform of family law, however, was unsuccessful.

The attack upon tradition was led primarily by educated members of the middle and upper classes who were not representative of the vast majority of Egyptians. Beginning in the late 1920s, disaffected elements of the population began to seek practical solutions to their economic problems and sustenance for their spiritual needs by joining organizations that operated outside the structured party system. This popular reaction against the foreign-inspired parliamentary regime was also a reaction against the secularism it represented. Many of the voluntary organizations that sprang up in the 1930s were associated with one form or another of Islamic activism. By far the most significant of them—and one of the most significant organizations in recent Egyptian history—was the Muslim Brotherhood.

Founded in Isma‘iliyya in 1928 by Hasan al-Banna, a layman educated at the Teachers’ Training College, the brotherhood grew dramatically during the 1930s, and by the end of the decade, it had 500 branches throughout Egypt and a membership numbering tens of thousands. The program of the brotherhood was a mixture of the traditional and the innovative. It was traditional in that al-Banna believed that the social and political regeneration of Egypt was intimately tied to the restoration of Islam as a guiding force in national life. To this end, he called for the reimplemention of the shari‘ah, arguing that the ills from which Egypt suffered could be traced to the replacement of Quranic principles by secular legal and political institutions. However, al-Banna’s insistence on the restoration of the shari‘ah did not imply a simplistic resurrection of the past. As Muhammad Abduh had done earlier, al-Banna sought to find a way for Muslims to take advantage of the technological advances of the twentieth century without compromising their commitment to Islamic values. He argued, much as Abduh had, that the shari‘ah was originally formulated to meet a specific set of historical circumstances and was thus a product of informed human reasoning. In al-Banna’s view, the restored shari‘ah would be subject to interpretation and would hence be fully compatible with the needs of a modern society. The lack of specificity in al-Banna’s political proposals should not detract from the power of his vision; he called forth not so much an Islamic state as an Islamic order that—precisely because of its Islamic basis—would ensure social justice, economic well-being, and political harmony.

The brotherhood’s direct appeal to Islamic-based social reform and social responsibility constituted part of its attraction. While the politicians bickered, the brotherhood acted and made its presence felt across a broad spectrum of Egyptian society. Al-Banna advocated such economic reforms as land redistribution, the introduction of social welfare programs, and the replacement of foreign capital by local investment. The brotherhood forged close ties with Egypt's emergent labor movement and defended workers' demands for union protection and unemployment benefits. It also established its own enterprises—most notably in the fields of weaving, transportation, and construction—and granted workers shareholding rights in these companies. To bridge the gap that split Egyptian society into secular and religious spheres, al-Banna's followers founded primary schools that tried to combine religious instruction with training in scientific and technical subjects. The organization also provided material assistance to society's underprivileged by setting up free medical clinics and soup kitchens to feed the urban poor during the height of the depression. In this extensive range of activities, the Muslim Brotherhood manifested al-Banna's belief that social justice was more than a matter of legislation; it was, in effect, part of a social ethos that could be realized only by a return to Islamic values.

The appeal of the Muslim Brotherhood was widespread and cut across class lines. It became the focus for those who were marginalized by Egypt's disruptive transformation. To the urban poor—and especially to the large number of them who were recent migrants from the countryside—the organization offered material assistance, communal associations, and spiritual comfort. The brotherhood also attracted a large following among university students, who faced the prospect of low-paying civil service jobs and a lifetime of frustrated expectations. The youth were also drawn to the brotherhood's uncompromising stand on complete independence and its denunciation of the Treaty of 1936 and all the compromises associated with that agreement. And to all who felt adrift in a world of changing values and increasingly complex relationships, the brotherhood represented the stability of Islamic values and offered the hope that they could be incorporated into the uncertain future. This powerful combination of appeals allowed the Muslim Brotherhood to emerge from World War II as a potent force in Egyptian politics.

Despite the outward trappings of secularism evident during the years of the liberal experiment, Egyptian society as a whole remained firmly committed to its Islamic roots. And despite the symbolic recognition of the country's sovereignty in the Treaty of 1936 and its admission to the League of Nations in 1937, the presence of British troops in the canal zone suggested that in times of crisis for the British Empire, London, not Cairo, would chart Egypt's course. World War II was one such crisis.

AN OVERVIEW OF WORLD WAR II

In this chapter and the two that follow, we examine the impact of World War II on the individual Arab countries. In order to place the conflict in the context of the Middle East and illustrate the region's crucial role in the Allied conduct of the war, let us consider a brief overview of the Second World War.

During the month of June 1940, France fell and German forces occupied most of Western Europe. The main theater of war then shifted to the skies above Britain, where, during summer and fall 1940, the Battle of Britain raged between the German Luftwaffe and the Royal Air Force. The British pilots prevailed, and for the moment, Britain seemed secure from invasion. However, the overseas communication routes and oil fields vital to continued British participation in the war remained vulnerable and were drawn into the arena of battle.

During the two years following the Battle of Britain, a giant Axis pincer movement gradually closed on the British positions in the Middle East. By 1942, the pincer seemed ready to squeeze shut. In the north, the Wehrmacht, already in occupation of the Balkans up to the Turkish border, had Stalingrad under siege and was penetrating through the Caucasian oil fields toward the Caspian Sea. In the south, the seesaw Western Desert campaign appeared to have swung in favor of the Axis forces. During summer 1942, General Erwin Rommel's Afrika Korps penetrated into Egypt, driving the British forces back to al-Alamain, only seventy miles (112 kilometers) from Alexandria and within striking distance of the Suez Canal.

Then, in October 1942, the British launched a counteroffensive at al-Alamain that swept Rommel's forces out of Egypt and across Libya to Tunisia, finally defeating them in spring 1943. At the same time—the winter of 1942–1943—the Germans suffered a catastrophic defeat in the Battle of Stalingrad; it marked the start of their long retreat from the Soviet Union. The Allies followed up their triumph in North Africa with the invasion of Italy in 1943 and the massive seaborne landing at Normandy in June 1944. On May 8, 1945, Germany surrendered. The war in the Pacific came to an end in September, hastened by the US decision to drop atomic bombs on Hiroshima and Nagasaki.

The Axis pincer had not clamped shut on the Middle East after all. During the troubled years from 1940 to 1942, however, the Allied victory was by no means a foregone conclusion. This period of uncertainty for Britain and of humiliation for France presented their imperial subjects with an opportunity to escape their control. But the crisis years also offered a chance for individuals whom the forces of imperialism had elevated to positions of power to express their gratitude. The regional responses to the Allied predicament were not uniform and illustrate the complexity of the relationships that had developed during the interwar period.

EGYPT DURING WORLD WAR II: PIVOT OF THE BRITISH DEFENSE SYSTEM

The British war correspondents who regularly gathered at the grand bar of the Cecil Hotel in Alexandria needed no wire reports to tell them how the campaign in the Western Desert was faring; the speed—or lack of it—with which the Egyptian bartenders served their drinks told them of the results on the battlefield: During spring 1942, thirsty British correspondents grew impatient at the length of time it took for them to be served. The barmen at the Cecil were not the only Egyptians ambivalent toward the British cause; many of Egypt's political leaders offered only a hesitant endorsement of Britain's war effort, and some among them maintained contacts with Axis agents just in case the outcome of the war should find German troops replacing British ones in the streets of Cairo.

When Britain entered the war in 1939, the Egyptian government fulfilled its treaty obligations by imposing martial law and breaking diplomatic relations with Germany. Egypt was not required to declare war and did not do so; the country's ruling politicians wished to keep Egypt out of the conflict, but this proved impossible. As the Axis pincer closed on the Middle East, Britain made Egypt the pivot of its Mediterranean defense. During the course of the war, as many as 500,000 British and Commonwealth troops passed through Egypt. Cairo, as the headquarters of the Middle East supply center and the main urban attraction for soldiers on leave, swarmed with British military and civilian personnel. Because of Egypt's importance to Britain's war effort, it became the target of Axis military operations. In concert with Rommel's land-based invasion from the Western Desert, the Axis powers mounted persistent air raids on the Alexandria harbor and tried to infiltrate the Egyptian armed forces and political institutions.

These and other related wartime developments affected the course of Egyptian political and economic life. Inflation was rampant, and basic foodstuffs were in such short supply that bread riots broke out in Cairo in 1942. Egyptians blamed the shortage of grain on the presence of the Allied troops. Because wartime conditions restricted the country's trade, Egypt was forced to improve its industrial base. By the end of the war, local self-sufficiency had been achieved in the manufacture of such goods as sugar and tobacco products, and the production of shoes, cement, cotton thread, and glass had increased notably. As a result of the expansion of Egyptian enterprise and the employment of more than 200,000 Egyptians in war-related jobs, the local labor force experienced considerable growth, and the trade union movement gained momentum.

In the realm of politics, the events of the war discredited the whole range of institutions—monarchy, parliamentary government, and the Wafd Party—that had governed Egypt since 1923 and led to the political paralysis that lasted until the revolution of 1952. At the outbreak of the war, Egypt was governed by a coalition cabinet headed by Ali Mahir, a known Axis sympathizer and a close personal adviser to King Faruq. When Mahir resigned in 1940, a succession of unstable coalition cabinets held power and tried to keep Egypt's future diplomatic options open by avoiding an overt break with the Axis yet maintaining correct relations with Britain. In winter 1942, the ruling coalition broke up and resigned.

This set the stage for the event known as the February Fourth Incident. Like the hangings at Dinshaway thirty-six years earlier, it was an episode in Anglo-Egyptian relations that had repercussions far exceeding the scope of the event itself. King Faruq was eager to have his confidant, Mahir, assume the vacant premiership. But with Rommel's forces within striking distance of Alexandria, Britain was in no mood to countenance a government headed by the pro-Axis Mahir. Instead, the British embassy decided that a Wafdist government under longtime party leader Mustafa al-Nahhas would be the most likely to cooperate during this period of extreme crisis. To make his government's position known, the British ambassador, Sir Miles Lampson, arranged for an audience with King Faruq on the evening of February 4, 1942. Before calling on the king, Lampson ordered British tanks and troops to surround the royal residence at Abdin Palace. He then presented Faruq with an ultimatum: The king could invite the Wafd to form a government, or he could abdicate. Faruq chose to appoint a Wafdist cabinet.

Lampson's heavy-handed tactics during the February Fourth Incident emphasized Britain's control over Egyptian domestic affairs and infuriated nationalist sympathizers. In addition, the incident discredited the local participants and accelerated the demise of Egypt's enfeebled parliamentary system. The king was humiliated and became more determined than ever to curtail the power of the Wafd, and the Wafd itself was compromised. As in 1936, when a Wafdist government signed the independence treaty that allowed for a continued British military presence in Egypt, the party once again appeared ready to abandon its nationalist principles and cooperate with Britain in exchange for political power. Over the course of the next decade, the Wafd continued to suffer from the fact that in 1942 it took office under the protection of British tanks.

In an attempt to shore up its reputation and gain control over the new forces spawned by the wartime economy, al-Nahhas's government enacted long-neglected social and labor legislation, including laws granting legal recognition to trade unions. The Wafd also took the initiative in encouraging the formation of a loose federation of Arab states, commonly known as the Arab League, which came into existence in 1945. Created to promote regional economic, political, and cultural cooperation, the Arab League quickly became a forum in which the Arab member states expressed their disapproval of the creation of a Jewish state in Palestine. Headquartered in Cairo and directed by an Egyptian, Abd al-Rahman al-Azzam, the organization served as a symbol of Egypt's growing involvement in the affairs of the Arab world.

As the war in Europe wound down, the Egyptian political situation remained unsettled. The Wafd, undisputed champion of independence in 1919, was now regarded as a corrupt and bloated party of privilege that had been co-opted by the British. The splinter opposition parties stood no higher in popular esteem. Born more out of personality clashes among Wafdist than out of ideological differences, they failed to generate widespread support. In the absence of credible parties, the monarchy and the extraparliamentary organizations, most notably the Muslim Brotherhood, moved to the forefront of Egyptian politics in the immediate postwar years.

IRAQ BETWEEN THE WARS

From the Establishment of the Mandate to Independence

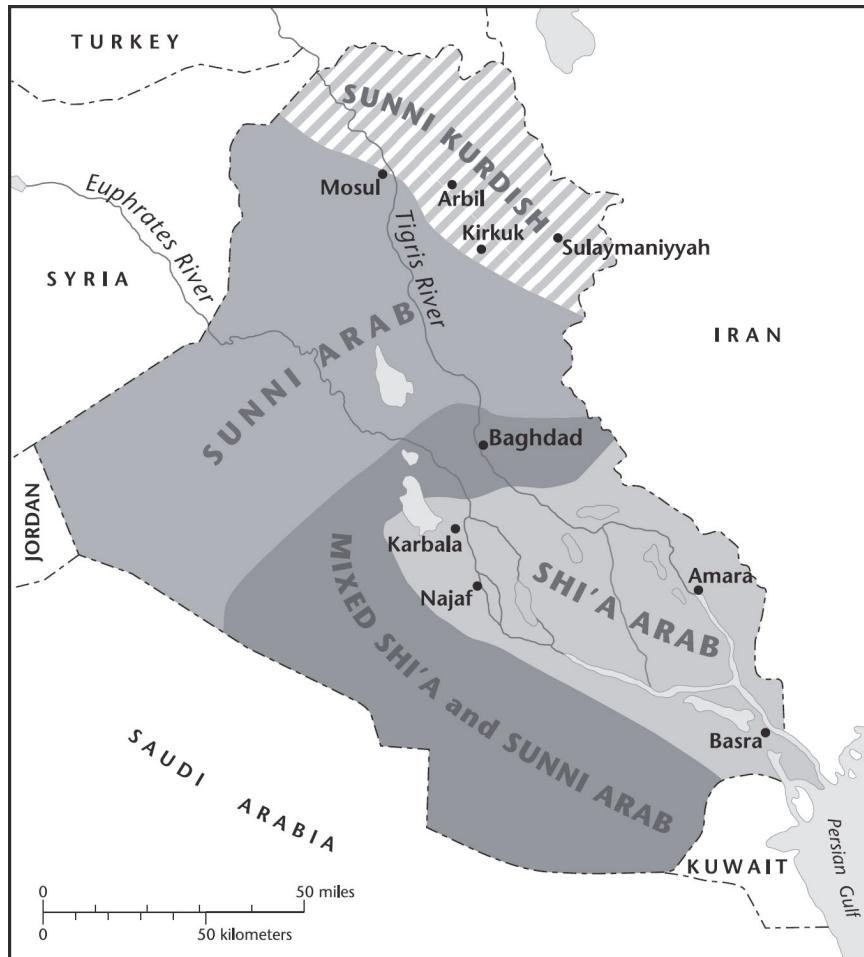

The British officials who determined the boundaries of the post-Ottoman Arab world were at their most arbitrary in the case of the new state of Iraq. The Ottomans had administered the Mesopotamian region as three separate and very distinct provinces. The mountainous northern province of Mosul was linked economically to Anatolia and Greater Syria, whereas the central province of Baghdad supported sedentary agriculture and traded primarily with Iran and the southwest. Basra, the southern province, was oriented toward the Persian Gulf and overseas trade with India. When these three provinces became the state of Iraq under a British mandate in 1920, they did not constitute a political community. Their forced amalgamation into a single country posed exceptionally difficult obstacles to nation building.

Arabs made up roughly 80 percent of the population, but they were sharply divided along religious lines. Slightly over half of the Arab inhabitants professed Shi‘ism and maintained close ties with the ulama of neighboring Iran. The remainder of the Arabs were Sunnis. Even though they were a numerical minority, the British supported their rise to political prominence in the new state. Potential for further discord came from the large Kurdish minority—some 20 percent of the total population—concentrated in the north. Though nominally Sunni Muslims, the Kurds were a distinct people with their own language and culture. They regarded the northern reaches of Iraq as well as adjacent regions of Turkey, Syria, and Iran as their ancestral homeland and sought to preserve their cultural and political autonomy. The Kurds’ resistance to the centralizing efforts of the new Iraqi state and their unwillingness to assimilate into the majority Arab outlook shaped a pattern of conflict that runs through the history of modern Iraq from its founding to the present day. The presence of an Assyrian Christian minority in the north and a substantial Jewish community in Baghdad added to prospects for religious and ethnic tensions in the new state (see Map 11.1).

In addition to creating the potential for such tensions, the British officials who delineated the Iraqi frontiers disadvantaged the new state by restricting its access to the Persian Gulf. With only thirty-six miles (fifty-eight kilometers) of coastline, most of it unsuited to the development of deep-water port facilities, Iraq had reason to covet the more geographically favorable coast of neighboring Kuwait. The border between the two states became a frequent source of friction from the 1930s onward, culminating in the Iraqi annexation of Kuwait in 1990 (see Chapter 22).

Because the Ottoman presence in Iraq had been confined to the major cities, tribal confederations accustomed to freedom from government interference dominated large areas of the countryside. The difficulties in imposing foreign rule over the diverse and often autonomous inhabitants of Iraq were brought home to the British occupying authorities by a huge uprising that broke out among the tribes of the Euphrates in June 1920. Lasting for several months, the uprising was a localized rebellion against Britain and the British attempt to replace the decentralized Ottoman system with centralized governmental structures. But even though the rebellion was not a self-consciously nationalist movement, it was inspired by anti-British sentiments and became enshrined in Iraqi national mythology as the first symbol of the new state's rejection of foreign rule. Britain finally managed to quell the uprising, but at an enormous cost: the lives of perhaps as many as 10,000 Iraqi tribespeople, 450 British soldiers, and an expenditure of £40 million. The combination of a war-weary British public and an exhausted British treasury convinced London that such costs should not again be incurred.

MAP 11.1. The distribution of major ethnic and religious groups within Iraq.

The issue for British policymakers thus became how to guarantee British interests in the country—the security of imperial communications with India and the protection of the Iraqi and Iranian oil fields—without assuming the costly and onerous burden of directly governing the volatile population. The solution was to deal with Iraq on a treaty basis and to reduce expenses by placing as much responsibility in the hands of the Iraqi government as an imperial power could bear to do. With this general policy in mind, the British set out to identify a ruler with whom they could work and who was likely to be acceptable to a broad cross-section of the Iraqi population.

Their choice was Amir Faysal, the field commander of the Arab Revolt, the son of Sharif Husayn, and the monarch of the recently dismembered Syrian kingdom. In selecting Faysal, the British may have been guided in part by a sense of guilt over their abandonment of Husayn and his family after the war. However, they also believed that Faysal would be moderate and that his reputation as an Arab figure of international stature would prove attractive within Iraq. Faysal was brought to the country in 1921, confirmed as king in a carefully managed national referendum, and coronated in ceremonies held in Baghdad—during which a military band played “God Save the King,” as an Iraqi national anthem did not exist yet. Nor were there systems of government, education, national defense, or any of the institutions by which a nation is defined and administered. Faysal faced a daunting challenge in guiding the dissident amalgam of peoples, who were Iraqis in name only, to statehood.

The form of government was embodied in the Organic Law of 1925 in which Iraq was defined as a hereditary constitutional monarchy with an elected bicameral legislature. According to the Organic Law, Islam was the state religion, and the shari‘ah courts, for both Sunni and Shi‘a, retained jurisdiction over personal status and waqfs. Other basic national institutions were quickly brought into existence. The Iraqi army, founded in 1921, was to be both a national symbol and an essential instrument of state authority. Originally limited by the British to 7,500 men, the army was expanded after independence in 1932 and came to number slightly over 26,000 men by the late 1930s. Another of Iraq’s pressing needs, both to assist in developing a sense of national identity as well as to train government officials, was the establishment of a public school system. Iraq had a much less developed educational infrastructure under the Ottomans than did Syria; in 1920, the entire secondary student population numbered less than 200. To correct this situation, Faysal arranged for Sati al-Husri, the former Ottoman official, to become director general of education in 1921. Under al-Husri’s energetic direction, a secular state school system was quickly set up, and by 1930, primary enrollment had doubled and the number of secondary students had increased to nearly 2,000. Al-Husri also made sure the curriculum promoted the development of patriotism and national culture.

Following King Faysal’s coronation, Britain had to be careful not to compromise him by making him appear to be a British puppet. His regime needed the continued support of the British army and air force to maintain any semblance of control, but it also needed to distance itself from the British embrace and to forge ties to the local population. Britain recognized the delicacy of Faisal's position and revised the terms of the mandate through a series of treaties between 1922 and 1930 to allow Iraq an increased degree of autonomy in the administration of its internal affairs. In the last treaty signed in 1930, Iraq was to gain full independence within two years, whereas Britain was to retain military and security privileges similar to those that prevailed in Egypt. Thus, Britain was bound to come to Iraq's aid in case of war, and Iraq was bound to grant Britain full use of all communications facilities required for its defense. The treaty also allowed Britain to control the development of the Iraqi armed forces by requiring that any Iraqi military personnel trained abroad had to be trained in Britain, that all foreign military instructors in Iraq be British, and that all the arms for the Iraqi military be supplied exclusively by Britain. To make doubly sure of imperial concerns, Britain was also granted the right to maintain two air bases in the country. In 1932, Iraq duly received formal independence and was admitted to the League of Nations. The least likely—and one of the least prepared—of the Ottoman successor states was the first to achieve international recognition of its sovereignty.

One additional element influencing Britain's attitude toward Iraq was the contest for control of oil resources—an important new factor in international relations. Europe's scramble for colonies in the late nineteenth century became a scramble for oil concessions in the 1920s. This produced a contradiction in British policy; at the same time Britain was encouraging the appearance of Iraqi independence, it was also trying to wrest a favorable oil concession from Faisal's government. The Iraqis, in desperate need of the funds that would come from royalty payments, reluctantly conceded to British pressures and, in 1925, signed a seventy-five-year concession with the firm that became the Iraq Petroleum Company. The agreement provided for Iraq to receive modest royalties at a specified sum per ton of oil but excluded Iraq from having any ownership in the company. Although the rich oil fields of northern Iraq were not brought into full production until after World War II, their existence, along with Britain's control of them, was a constant irritant in Anglo-Iraqi relations.

The unstable polity that Britain had created out of three disparate Ottoman provinces somehow survived its first decade of independent nationhood. However, Iraq's difficulties showed the results of grafting European institutions of government onto an ethnically and religiously fragmented society and then importing a ruler who was expected to make the imposed system work. When Faisal assumed the Iraqi throne in 1921, he was foreign to the region and had only the most tenuous ties to his new country. His monarchy had been brought into existence by Britain, the alien occupier, not by popular demand. Faisal recognized the importance of identifying himself with Iraqi interests and was reasonably successful in doing so. By encouraging Britain to move rapidly toward granting independence, he demonstrated his loyalty to his adopted kingdom and convinced the majority of the population of his devotion to their welfare. Most historical accounts give Faisal credit for skillfully accommodating the almost impossible pressures placed upon him. However, his untimely death in 1933 deprived the country of his experienced leadership and virtually removed the monarchy as a factor in Iraqi politics. Faisal's twenty-one-year-old son and successor, Ghazi (1933–1939), was inept and uninterested in affairs of state.

In the absence of leadership from the palace, a narrow clique of individuals without previous experience in civilian administration came to dominate the government. They were an unlikely group of politicians, differing markedly from their counterparts in Egypt, Syria, and Palestine. Of the four men who, among them, held the premiership thirteen times from 1921 to 1941, all were native Iraqis born between 1880 and 1888, all had graduated from the Imperial War College in Istanbul, all had joined Faysal in the Arab Revolt before 1918, and all were from lower-class backgrounds. A fifth figure, Yasin al-Hashimi (1884–1937), who was twice prime minister and exercised a towering political influence in the 1930s, was also a graduate of the Imperial War College. He differed from the other four in that he served in the Ottoman forces throughout World War I, rising to the rank of major general. The prestige derived from their Istanbul education, combined with the support they received from Faysal and the British, elevated this coterie of former Ottoman officers of humble origins to positions of authority from which they dominated Iraqi politics during their lifetimes. The most durable of them was Nuri al-Sa‘id (1888–1958), who was prime minister five times during the 1930s and was again holding that office when the monarchy was overthrown in 1958. The consolidation of power in the hands of these particular elites represented a significant sectarian trend in Iraqi politics. All of them, as well as most of the other figures who controlled Iraqi political life, were Sunni Muslims. Thus, even though the Shi‘a constituted a majority of Iraq’s Arab population, they were excluded from power during the country’s formative years and remained underrepresented in Iraq’s political structure up to the US occupation in 2003.

The former Ottoman officers began their Iraqi political careers as salaried civil servants and ended them as wealthy landed proprietors and industrial entrepreneurs; they came to regard themselves as equals to the established notable families, whose expectations of political power they had usurped. Whatever reforming ideals they may have possessed when they returned to Iraq after the war vanished with their acquisition of power and influence. As an astute scholar of modern Iraq has noted, instead of the ex-

Ottoman officers subduing the old social order, it subdued them and gave them a stake in its perpetuation.³

With the loss of Faysal's mediating skills, Iraq's emergent political elite fell out with one another. Politics degenerated into a series of power struggles revolving around possession of the prime ministership, and governments rarely lasted more than a few months. Because the former officers had become committed to the preservation of the existing social order, they were divided not so much by ideological differences as by a desire for personal influence. What distinctions there were among them involved their attitudes toward Iraq's relationship with Britain. Some, like Yasin al-Hashimi, were impatient to end the country's dependence on British arms and to become more active in promoting Arab unity. Others, most notably Nuri al-Sa'id, were more moderate, recognizing their debt to Britain and reluctant to undertake activities that might prompt British intervention and deprive them of their newfound positions.

The infighting among the politicians, the accommodating attitude of many of them toward Britain, and the tight monopoly they exercised over political power disaffected large segments of Iraqi society. Most prominent among the opposition were the younger military officers, who regarded themselves and their organization as the true symbols of the new Iraqi nation. Imbued with sentiments of nationalism and Pan-Arabism, the army leaders were eager to assert Iraq's role in the Middle East as an independent nation. In 1933, the army and its northern commander, General Bakr Sidqi, gained a dubious reputation for protecting the national interest by engaging in a systematic massacre of members of the Assyrian Christian community. General Sidqi, enamored of the fame he had gained in the Assyrian affair, led a coup d'état that overthrew the government in 1936. This initiated a round of military coups—there were six more of them through 1941—that made the army the arbiter of Iraqi politics. Yet aside from adding to the already considerable instability of political life, the coups changed very little. They were unusual in that the military did not take over the government or abolish the parliamentary system; after each coup, one of the established civilian figures who had dominated Iraqi politics since 1921 emerged as the head of a new government. These old-line politicians clung to power by allying with one or another of the many factions within the officer corps. In the process, politics was more than ever reduced to intrigue, and constructive legislation became impossible.

The army, in its self-appointed role as the guardian of Iraqi nationalism, imparted a glorification of martial qualities to society at large. As Britain prepared for war with Adolf Hitler's Germany in 1939, a wave of Fascist-inspired paramilitary youth movements and increasing anti-British sentiment gripped a politically unstable Iraq. Britain's empire by treaty would be severely tested in the ensuing world conflict.

IRAQ DURING WORLD WAR II

Iraq's wartime experiences illustrate the two poles of local reaction to Britain's role in the country. One powerful segment of Iraq's ruling elite sought to use the war as a means to chart a path toward true sovereignty, whereas a second group of established politicians believed their own positions would be improved by retaining ties to Britain. The result of this domestic conflict was an armed confrontation, the Anglo-Iraqi War of 1941, which further divided the elite and left an enduring legacy of bitterness toward Britain.

At the outbreak of the European war in 1939, shifting coalitions of military officers and civilian politicians still controlled Iraqi political life. As a result of the military's grip on power, the civilian institutions of government, including the monarchy, were weakened. When King Ghazi was killed in an automobile accident in 1939, his three-year-old son took the throne as Faysal II. The infant king was placed under the regency of Abd al-Ilah, a prince of the Hashimite family and a close political ally of Nuri al-Sa'id. Nuri, still the most prominent of the civilian politicians, was heading his fifth government when the war broke out. Despite the British setbacks in the early stages of the conflict, Nuri continued to believe that Iraq's long-term interests would be best served by cooperating with Britain and supporting the Allied cause. However, he found his pro-British stance unpopular with the military officers and resigned the premiership in 1940.

In that same year, a loose alliance of four colonels, also known as the "Golden Square," gained political ascendancy and attempted to free Iraqi foreign policy from its British orientation. Motivated by sentiments of Iraqi nationalism and Pan-Arabism, and impressed by the success of German arms, the four colonels intended to take advantage of Britain's precarious military position to assert Iraq's full independence. They struck on April 1, 1941, effectively staging a coup d'état that brought Rashid Ali al-Gaylani to the premiership. Rashid Ali (b. 1892) was a Baghdad-trained lawyer who had served as prime minister on three previous occasions. Although a committed nationalist, he also had a reputation for opportunism and was chosen to head the government mainly because of his willingness to cooperate with the dominant officers. Regardless of however much an instrument of the four colonels Rashid Ali may have been, his name became linked to the most concerted effort of any Arab state to achieve independence during the war years.

Within a month of Rashid Ali's installation as prime minister, Britain and Iraq entered into hostilities. The crisis was precipitated by two issues: The first was the seeming pro-Axis orientation of Rashid Ali's government; the second was a disagreement over the interpretation of the Anglo-Iraqi treaty of 1930, specifically over whether Iraq was a truly independent nation with the right to exercise its sovereignty and deny Britain's plans to establish a supply base at the port of Basra. In the pressing circumstances of 1941, the British government was not interested in discussing the niceties of treaty language, especially with Rashid Ali's government, and instead went ahead with expanding the facilities at Basra. On May 2, 1941, the four colonels retaliated by ordering the Iraqi army to surround the British air base near Baghdad, an act that brought Britain and its former mandate to a state of war.

The British Middle Eastern command put together a relief force that marched from Palestine across the Transjordanian desert to Iraq. By the end of May 1941, the Rashid Ali revolt was defeated, and its leaders had fled Baghdad. In the anarchy that prevailed, the largely assimilated Jewish community of Baghdad was brutally attacked in an unprecedented outburst of communal violence. Britain placed Iraq under military occupation for the remainder of the war, enforcing the Iraqis' belief that Britain was treating their country as an imperial possession, not as a sovereign state. Britain also moved quickly to reestablish the old pro-British ruling coalition. Nuri al-Sa'id and the regent set about consolidating their hold on the machinery of government. Nuri headed two wartime cabinets and made sure his political opponents were crushed: He arranged for the extradition and execution of the revolt's leaders and forced Rashid Ali to remain in exile. Although Nuri and the regent, Abd al-Ilah, were to dominate Iraqi politics until 1958, both were tarnished by their return to power in the wake of the British invasion and were cast as opponents of nationalism. In this regard, their position was similar to that of the Wafd Party of Egypt after the February Fourth Incident.

Although the Rashid Ali revolt was a minor episode in the overall scope of World War II, it was an important event in Iraqi history and revealed the measure of frustration and disillusionment felt in both civilian and military quarters over Britain's continuing interference in Iraqi affairs. The British reoccupation of the country from 1941 to 1945 heightened these sentiments and added luster to the image of Rashid Ali and the movement associated with his name. The young officers who succeeded in toppling Nuri and the regent in 1958 claimed they were only carrying out the unfinished business of 1941.⁴

TRANSJORDAN: THE DESERT MANDATE

Because of the circumstances surrounding the establishment of Transjordan, it is difficult to disagree with the statement that it was an artificial state created to accommodate the interests of a foreign power and an itinerant prince in search of a throne.⁵ The foreign power, Britain, decided it would be useful to establish a dependent regime that might bring order to the tribal regions east of the Jordan River rather than attempting to do so itself, and the itinerant prince, Amir Abdallah, obtained the throne he believed his younger brother, Faysal, had stolen from him in Iraq.

Like Iraq, Transjordan had no previous existence as a political community. During the late Ottoman period, it was a neglected portion of the province of Syria, a desert region inhabited by Bedouin tribes over whom the Ottomans exercised little if any control. When Amman became the capital of this new British mandate in 1921, it was scarcely more than a large village with a population of between 2,500 and 5,000. It was in this underdeveloped and previously marginal territory that Amir Abdallah and his British advisers attempted to create a state.

Britain's principal interest in Transjordan was to use it to preserve the Anglo-French postwar settlement in the Middle East. The mandate's freewheeling tribes were indifferent to international borders and were accustomed to conducting raids into the territory that now formed part of the French mandate for Syria. Abdallah was given his throne and provided with a British subsidy and the support of British civilian and military personnel in order to prevent such raids as well as to bring order to the region.

At the time of its creation in 1921, Transjordan's long-term status was uncertain. By 1928, however, regional circumstances convinced Britain that the mandate served a useful purpose, and so an Anglo-Transjordanian agreement was signed to clarify the mutual rights of Abdallah and his Great Power patron. As was the case in Egypt and Iraq, British rule was indirect, but British interests were protected; the agreement gave the British resident the final word in foreign relations, the armed forces, the budget, and all other essential government activities. A constitution was also proclaimed in 1928, but it did not play a significant role in the evolution of Transjordan's political life. It provided for a small legislative council but made the council so completely subordinate to royal authority that Abdallah could easily control its members and rule more in the manner of a traditional monarch than a constitutional one.

Because Transjordan was created for the purpose of bringing stability to a decentralized tribal region, the British placed special emphasis on building a reliable armed force. The Arab Legion policed the frontiers of the mandate, and a special desert patrol, led by Captain John Glubb, was formed in 1930 to tackle internal security. Deploying armored cars, airplanes, and other modern weapons, the desert patrol wing of the Arab Legion was successful in subduing the tribes and halting raids. Although commanded by British officers, the troops of the Arab Legion were recruited from among the local population, especially the Bedouin tribes. Glubb molded them into a well-disciplined fighting force whose intense loyalty to the monarch made them a reliable instrument of Abdallah's rule.

With Transjordan's basically tribal composition, the development of a civilian bureaucracy depended on bringing in trained administrators from outside the mandate. The central positions in the new administration were staffed mainly by British and Palestinian officials, to whom were added a smattering of Hijazis and Syrians. Having no local family or regional power bases, these officials were not likely to engage in oppositional political activities. Indeed, throughout the interwar period, there was little in the way of political life; national parties were not formed, and Abdallah was content to build tribal alliances through the use of bribes and to eliminate tribal opposition by means of the Arab Legion.

Transjordan's chief regional impact during the mandate era was caused by Abdallah's restless search to expand his influence. The amir's ambitions exceeded the boundaries of his desert mandate, and he constantly schemed to obtain more territory, offering himself on various occasions as a candidate for the thrones of Syria and Iraq. He also tried to carve out a role as a mediator in Palestine, but his willingness to work with Zionist leaders made him suspect in Arab eyes. Abdallah's well-known personal ambitions, his close ties to Britain, and his family's control of the throne of Iraq caused most other Arab leaders to keep him at arm's length.

However much Abdallah may have chafed at his limited regional role and his dependence on Britain, he was shrewd enough to recognize that Britain had provided him with a territory and the means by which to make it a state. When World War II broke out, he did not hesitate to declare his allegiance to Britain. In the troubled early years of that conflict, he and his efficient army rendered invaluable service to the British cause in the Middle East.

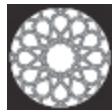

During the Rashid Ali crisis in Iraq, Abdallah placed his well-organized Arab Legion at Britain's disposal. It aided in guiding the relief force across the desert and in conducting raids in northern Iraq. Although Abdallah's deployment of his army in a British campaign against another Arab state added to his already clouded reputation in Arab nationalist circles, he hoped that his unequivocal support of Britain would be rewarded once the war was over. He was not disappointed. In 1946, Transjordan was granted independence, and Abdallah was elevated from prince to king. The awkward desert principality that had been created almost as an afterthought of the post-World War I settlement became, in the years following World War II, a prominent military and diplomatic force in the region.

CONCLUSION

Elizabeth Monroe used the phrase “Britain’s moment in the Middle East” to describe the interwar period of British dominance in the region.⁶ Yet even as Britain exercised control over mandates, protectorates, and quasi-independent states, the foundations for British expulsion were being laid. Iraqis and Egyptians chafed at the restrictions that made their countries’ “independence” less than complete, and many among them expressed growing disenchantment with local politicians who benefited from British rule and therefore failed to oppose it. The Rashid Ali movement in Iraq, led by young military officers, was a manifestation of discontent with British rule and with the British-backed civilian politicians who monopolized power. Britain managed to restore a friendly regime in Baghdad, to bring one to power in Cairo in 1942, and to emerge from World War II with its Middle Eastern base intact. But the war weakened Britain and emboldened those under British imperial control to challenge its authority. Although it may not have been obvious in 1945, Britain’s moment in the Middle East was coming to a close.

CHAPTER 12

THE ARAB STRUGGLE FOR INDEPENDENCE

Syria, Lebanon, and Saudi Arabia from the Interwar Era to 1945

The British ensured their Middle Eastern position during the interwar years by means of indirect rule; the French employed a different policy. From the moment General Gouraud's forces drove Faisal from Damascus in 1920, the presence of a large military contingent and a complex hierarchy of French civilian administrators supported French control of Syria and Lebanon. France's policy of direct rule placed decision-making authority in the hands of the high commissioner and provided little scope for local politicians to practice self-government. The result in Syria was that neither the political leaders nor the population at large gained a stake in the preservation of the French-imposed parliamentary system. The system lacked local legitimacy and did not long survive the French withdrawal in 1946. The situation was slightly different in Lebanon, where the local leadership contributed to the development of a unique confessional political system and acquired an interest in making the system function.

In contrast to the British and French mandates, the new state of Saudi Arabia managed to achieve full independence during the interwar era. Like Turkey, the Saudi state was shaped in the image of its dominant ruler, Ibn Sa‘ud. However, whereas Atatürk imposed a relentless secularism on interwar Turkey, Ibn Sa‘ud founded his new state on the doctrines of Wahhabi Islam.

Arab proposals to develop new bonds of communal loyalties during the interwar years ranged from an emphasis on regional identities to pleas for Arab and Islamic unity. No single organizing principle predominated. The notion of Arab unity had great appeal, but the frontiers Britain and France had drawn on the map of the Arab Middle East proved more enduring than many Arab leaders would have wished.

THE FRENCH MANDATE IN SYRIA AND LEBANON

The Policy of Divide and Rule in Syria

The provinces of Greater Syria suffered horribly during World War I. Famine and disease decimated the civilian population, and thousands of local military conscripts never returned from the far-flung Ottoman fronts. One study has concluded that over 600,000 inhabitants of Greater Syria lost their lives from 1915 to 1918, roughly 18 percent of the prewar population.¹ Added to the ongoing shocks of material deprivation, population losses, and social trauma were the imposition of French imperial rule and its accompanying disruptions.

The French claim to Syria was based on a combination of religious, economic, and strategic interests. As the self-proclaimed protector of the Christian communities in the Levant—and especially of the Catholic Maronites of Mount Lebanon—France professed a moral duty to continue its long-standing religious and educational activities in the region. Such a religious justification for imperial intervention only served to intensify the alienation the Muslim majority felt toward France.

The economic rationale for a French presence in the Levant stemmed from the extensive investments in railways, port facilities, and commercial exchanges that French enterprises had undertaken during the last Ottoman decades. The strategic needs to counterbalance British influence in the Middle East were intertwined with the beliefs held in influential French imperial circles that France would never be a true Mediterranean power until it acquired a Levant possession to go with its North African empire. As we have seen, France backed these claims with a military expedition that ousted Faisal's Arab government from Damascus and replaced it with a mandate later sanctioned by the League of Nations.

Instead of encouraging the formation of indigenous administrative institutions to prepare Syria for independence, the French created conditions that would prolong their rule. They did so by adopting a policy of divide and rule that emphasized the existing religious, ethnic, and regional differences within Syria. Thus, France promoted regional and ethnic fragmentation rather than national unity.

The first political division France imposed was the creation of Greater Lebanon in 1920. To the old mutasarrifiyyah of Mount Lebanon, France added the coastal cities of Tripoli, Tyre, Sidon, and Beirut; in addition, France removed the fertile Biqa Valley from Syrian jurisdiction and placed it within the frontiers of the expanded Lebanese state (see Map 12.1). The main beneficiaries of this territorial reallocation were France's clients, the Maronite Christians, who remained the single-largest religious community within the new Lebanon. French policy increased the possibilities of sectarian conflict. With the exception of Beirut, the areas added to Lebanon contained a predominantly Muslim population whose members objected to being placed within a Christian-dominated polity. Later in this chapter, we consider how the competition between conflicting sectarian interests affected the evolution of Lebanese political life.

Within the area of the Syrian mandate proper, France carved out a series of separate political units whose existence was designed to hinder the development of Syrian national identity (see Map 12.2). Thus, in 1920, Damascus and Aleppo were divided into two separate states, each with its own governor and its own set of French advisers. In a further effort at political fragmentation, France stressed the distinctiveness of Syria's two regionally compact minority groups, the Alawites (adherents to a form of Twelver Shi'ism) and the Druze, by providing each with a separate state in 1922. The Alawite state was situated around the northern coastal city of Latakia; that of the Jabal Druze was located in an area of Druze concentration south of Damascus. Except for a brief period from 1936 to 1939, both of these states were administratively separate from Syria until 1942. In 1924, France introduced a new political arrangement by combining the states of Damascus and Aleppo into a single unit called the State of Syria. In addition to Damascus and Aleppo, the reconstituted State of Syria comprised the cities of Homs and Hama, the next two largest urban centers in the mandate. Sunni Muslim merchants and landowners dominated society and politics in these four cities. In effect, France had isolated the Druze and the Alawites from national politics and ensured that whatever Syrian political life might exist would be under the sway of propertied, conservative urban Sunni Muslims. The destructive political instability that characterized Syria after independence in 1946 must be traced, in part, to this institutionalized fragmentation.

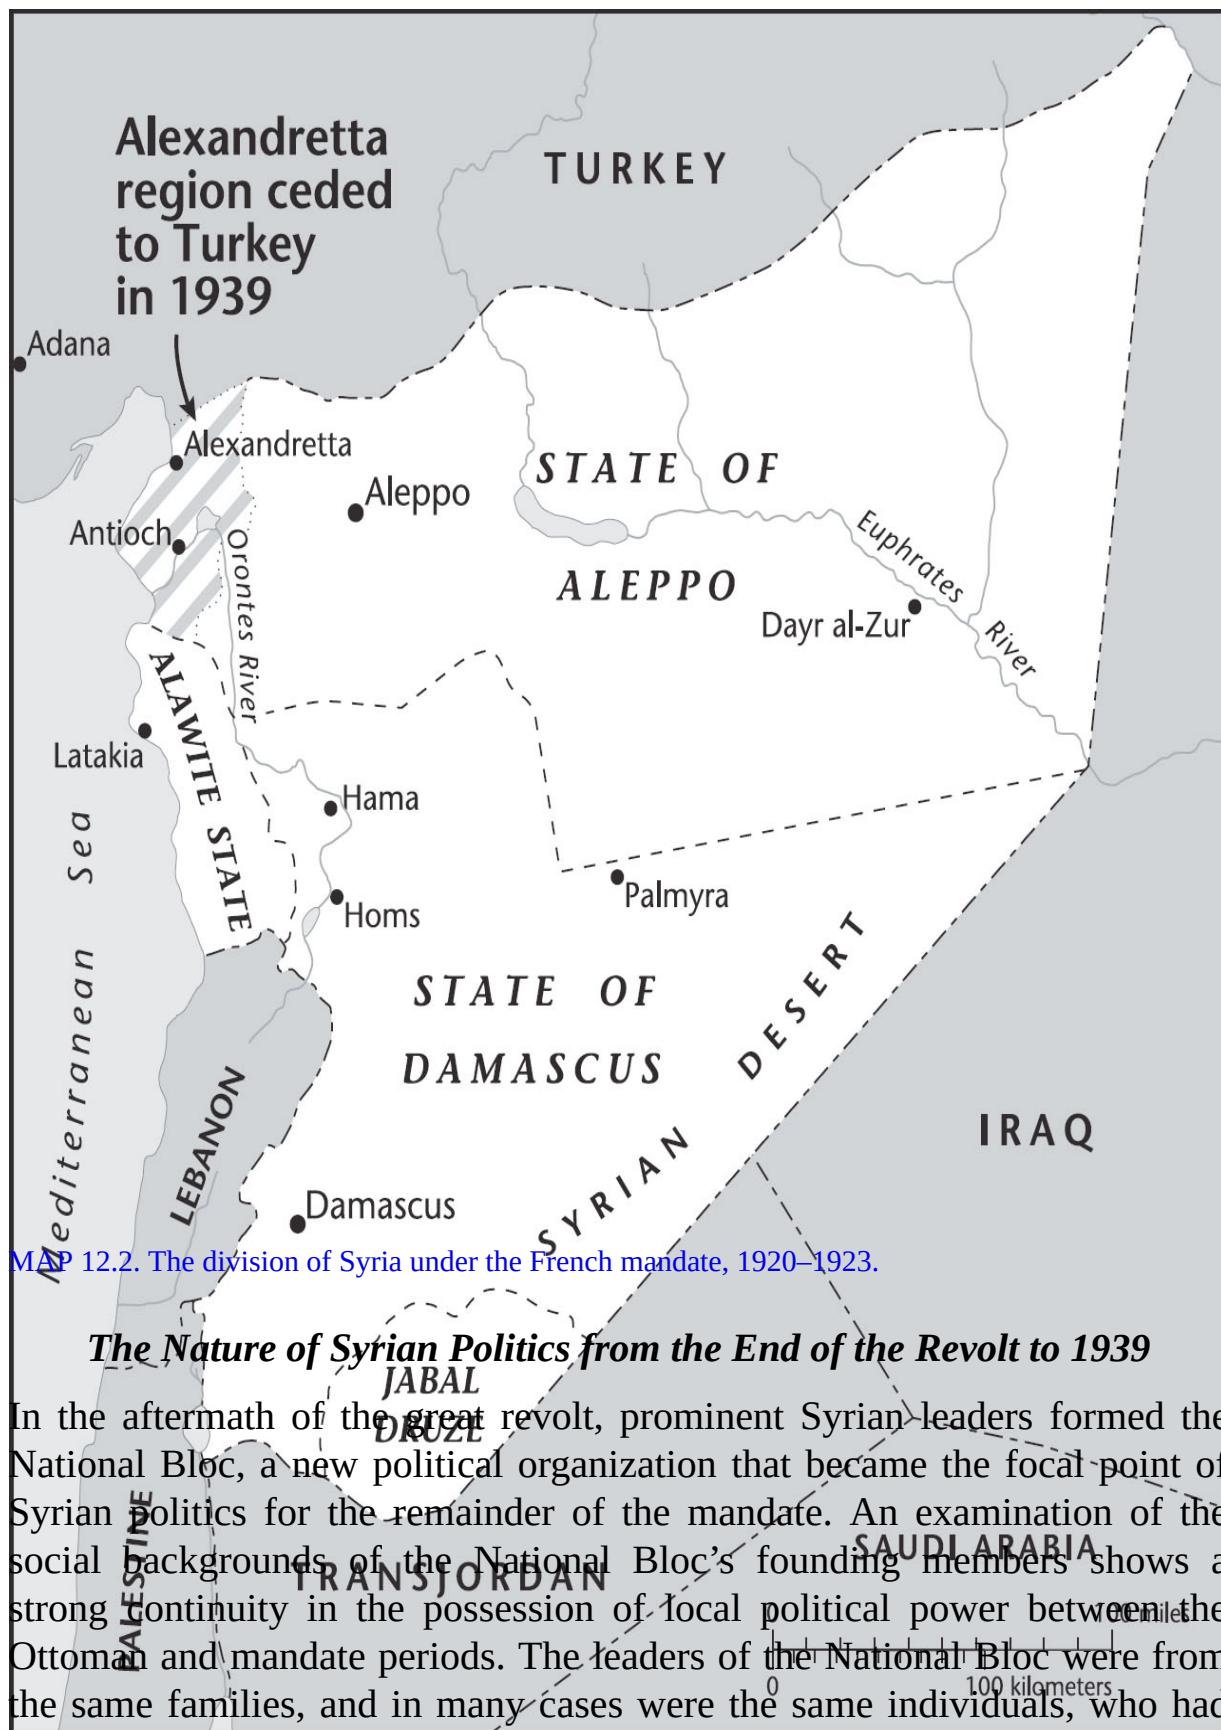

French policies in Syria were implemented through a large, costly, and often cumbersome bureaucracy supported by an intelligence service and a standing garrison of 15,000 troops of the Armée du Levant. Holding supreme decision-making authority in the administration was the high commissioner for Syria and Lebanon, headquartered in Beirut. The shifts and turns of the French mandate's early years were caused by the rapid turnover in the powerful office of high commissioner—four different individuals held the position between 1923 and 1926.

The French method of governing Syria discouraged the local people's acquisition of political responsibility and administrative experience. Procedures for electoral politics were slow to be introduced, and the top bureaucratic positions in the high commissioner's office went to French staff. Moreover, although there were local Syrian governors and district commissioners, they were not granted independent decision-making authority. Hovering beside every Syrian official was a French adviser who had veto power over even the smallest details. There appears to have been more attention devoted to the formation of an indigenous Syrian officer corps than to the bureaucracy. In 1920, the first year of the mandate, a military academy was founded. Employing French instructors, the academy produced a cadre of Syrian officers who were attached to the newly formed Syrian Legion, a locally recruited force that numbered around 6,000 by the mid-1930s. The social composition of the legion's officer corps was to have long-term implications for Syrian politics. Because the Sunni urban notable families tended to regard a military career with disdain, they refrained from enrolling their sons in the academy. This opened the way for other social and religious groups, for whom a career in the armed forces provided an avenue for upward mobility, to dominate the officer corps. With independence in 1946, these officers from minority religious groups brought the army into political life and changed the pattern of Sunni dominance (see Chapter 18).

The imposition of French authority met with local resistance in various regions of Syria during the mandate's first two years. However, the French army isolated and subdued these uprisings before they spread to other areas of the country. This was not the case with the great revolt of 1925–1927. Beginning as a localized rebellion, the revolt soon engulfed most of Syria and became a symbol of the common Syrian objection to the mandate.

The revolt originated in July 1925 in the State of Jabal Druze when the French governor attempted a rapid restructuring of Druze political relationships and landholding patterns. Led by the Druze chieftain Sultan Atrash, the armed uprising succeeded in driving French forces from the Jabal Druze. The enthusiasm with which the news of Atrash's military victories was received in Syria's cities prompted the normally cautious urban notables to cast their lot with the rebels. By autumn 1925, Homs and Damascus were in full revolt as the political leaders of the cities joined with the Druze chieftains of the rural south to ignite a nationwide resistance movement. The French military commanders, frustrated by their inability to contain the uprising, resorted to an ill-conceived display of imperial force: Beginning in the evening of October 18, 1925, they subjected the venerable city of Damascus to an air and artillery bombardment that lasted for forty-eight hours and may have killed as many as 1,400 people. Despite such drastic measures, the revolt raged on until spring 1927, when massive French military reinforcements managed to quell it. The revolt left a devastating legacy: Some 6,000 Syrians died, many thousands more were left homeless, and parts of the commercial center of Damascus were reduced to rubble. France also paid a high price in lives and money; the revolt convinced French policymakers to revise—though not renounce—their plans for controlling Syria.

exercised authority during the Ottoman era. They were representative of the class of landowning urban notables and local government officials who had managed to flourish under the Ottomans, as they were to do under the French, by practicing the style of political behavior known as the politics of the notables. This political style, called “honorable cooperation” by the National Bloc leaders, required the notables to maintain influence over their local client base. Their strategy was to adopt the anti-French sentiments that had become increasingly widespread among Syrian urbanites while at the same time persuading the French that they could control their clients and convince them to accept compromise solutions to the question of Syrian independence. In short, they presented themselves to the French, much as they had to the Ottomans, as necessary intermediaries in governance. Eager to avoid a repetition of the revolt of 1925–1927, the mandate administration was willing, within limitations, to work with the National Bloc.

The National Bloc leaders were nationalists in that they called for Greater Syria’s independence and territorial integrity. However, their nationalism was of a conservative variety because they sought to preserve the existing patterns of social, economic, and political relationships from which their wealth and power derived. Thus, although they demanded French withdrawal, they also wished to retain their dominant local positions so they could replace the French when the time came. These dual objectives required them to balance their anti-French proclamations with sufficient cooperation to avoid being exiled or jailed. In their social goals and political behavior, they were not unlike the Egyptian Wafdist or the Nuri al-Sa‘id wing of the new Iraqi elite.

The National Bloc leaders acquired little experience in governing during the mandate. France’s refusal to negotiate a treaty spelling out its future intentions in Syria and its reluctance to allow the development of institutions of local self-government created frustration and uncertainty within Syrian political circles. A duly elected Syrian constituent assembly drew up a constitution in 1929, but France rejected it. A year later, France imposed its own constitution on Syria; it upheld France’s role as the mandate authority and thus prevented Syria from adopting any measures that might impinge on French mandatory privileges. For the next six years, Syrian presidents and prime ministers held office, and Syrian legislatures met in annual sessions. But France's power to veto legislation made a charade out of Syrian political life and lent it an aura of unreality.

Hopes for an end to the stalemate in Franco-Syrian relations rose with the victory of Léon Blum's Popular Front coalition in the French elections of 1936. The optimism seemed justified; by the year's end, representatives of both countries had signed a draft treaty. The treaty was similar to the Anglo-Iraqi agreement of 1930; it provided for an alliance between France and Syria and granted France the right to defend Syrian sovereignty and to maintain air bases and military garrisons on Syrian soil. Syria was also to achieve the hallmark of independence: admission to the League of Nations.

Upon the Syrian parliament's ratification of the draft treaty in 1936, the National Bloc prepared to assume power in a semi-independent country. But Syrian expectations of sovereignty were bitterly disappointed. Blum's leftist coalition unraveled in 1937, and the French chamber refused to ratify the Franco-Syrian treaty. Syria was once again placed under firm French control. In 1939, the high commissioner suspended the Syrian constitution, dissolved parliament, and reestablished the autonomy of the Alawite and Druze states. The French further offended Syrian opinion by ceding to Turkey the district of Alexandretta, a region Syrians regarded as an integral part of their nation (see Map 12.2).

After nearly twenty years of the mandate, Syria remained without independence, institutions of self-government, and territorial unity. Moreover, the leaders of its principal political organization, the National Bloc, found themselves discredited by the failure of their moderate approach to achieve any measure of success. The French legacy to Syria was almost a guarantee of political instability.

LEBANON UNDER THE MANDATE: THE ESTABLISHMENT OF CONFESSİONAL POLITICS

Lebanon, in the words of one observer, was "born schizophrenic."² When General Gouraud proclaimed the creation of Greater Lebanon in 1920, his objective was to safeguard the Maronite community by making sure it would not be absorbed into a Syrian Muslim state. Greater Lebanon was brought into existence to provide the Maronites with a distinct political entity in which they were the single-largest religious community. However, they did not compose a majority of the population. By adding several predominantly Muslim areas to the new state, the French reduced the Maronites to about 30 percent of the population. This action ensured that the Maronites would be dependent on French backing if they were to retain their political dominance within the new state's frontiers.

It also ensured the existence of a volatile political mix in which competition for power would be based on sectarian affiliations. The Maronites viewed Lebanon as their own special Christian homeland and assumed that political and economic preeminence was theirs by right. With the support of their French patrons, they envisaged that the state would develop as a Christian enclave with a Franco-Mediterranean cultural orientation. The face of Lebanon would point westward toward Europe, and its back would be turned to the Arab world. However, the Sunni Muslims, who became part of Lebanon by French decree, not of their own volition, had different expectations; they demanded unity with Syria and looked toward the wider Arab world for their cultural identity.

Lebanon's uncertain relationship with its Arab neighbors was not the only source of communal tension within the new state. The nature of the existing political culture and the geographical distribution of the various religious communities posed problems for the creation of a cohesive national system of government. In Lebanon, as elsewhere in the former Ottoman Arab provinces, the individuals' primary loyalty was to their religious communities. But in Lebanon, with the exception of the Maronites in Mount Lebanon and the Druze in the Shuf, the religious communities tended to be scattered throughout the country, creating a sectarian mosaic in which various religious groups lived side by side. Lebanon also had in common with adjacent Arab territories a political culture rooted in the relationships between groups of local notables and their clients. What imparted a special twist to the Lebanese situation was the religious diversity of the local notables. In Syria, for example, the local notable politicians possessed common economic and religious characteristics: They were mainly urban dwellers who adhered to Sunni Islam. But in Lebanon, local notables were as likely to have a rural as an urban power base, and they were of mixed sectarian composition, ranging from Druze princes to Maronite merchants to Sunni landowners. These notables endeavored to advance the interests of their clients, who were also their coreligionists, at other groups' expense. If Greater Lebanon was to survive as a state, it would have to develop a political system that could accommodate these competing interests.

Because Lebanon, with its pro-French Maronite community, was more receptive to the mandate than was Syria, it experienced a smoother passage toward internal autonomy. In 1926, a constitution was approved, creating the Lebanese republic. The constitution provided for a single chamber of deputies that was elected on the basis of religious representation, a principle that had been accepted during the period of the mutasarrifiyyah. The precise formula for determining this representation was specified in the National Pact of 1943. The constitution also provided for a president who was elected by the chamber. The president's extensive authority included the right to appoint the prime minister and the cabinet. But the constitution did not imply Lebanese independence, nor was it accompanied by a bilateral treaty between France and Lebanon. The mandate was firmly in force, and France retained control of Lebanese foreign relations and military affairs. The French high commissioner also had the right to dissolve parliament and suspend the constitution, privileges he exercised twice (1932 to 1934 and again in 1939). In addition, the ever-present network of French advisers within each ministry further limited the freedom of the Lebanese to control their own domestic affairs. Despite these restrictions, Lebanon at least had a constitutional framework within which to practice electoral politics and some measure of self-government.

The crucial political issue facing Lebanon during the 1930s was the need to reconcile the conflicting aspirations of the Christian and Muslim communities and persuade them to work together to construct a distinctly Lebanese polity. The attitudes of two leading Maronite politicians, Emile Eddé and Bishar al-Khuri, on the issue of Muslim-Christian cooperation can serve to illustrate why Muslims were reluctant to accept the Lebanese state as well as to suggest the ways in which Muslim suspicions were overcome. During the mandate period, Eddé, a Paris-trained lawyer, held the premiership once and served as Lebanon's president from 1936 to 1941. A man of French taste and culture, Eddé was not displeased by the presence of the mandatory power on Lebanese soil. For him, Lebanon was above all else the Maronite Christian homeland, and he believed the basic purpose of the state was to preserve Maronite dominance. Distrustful of Muslims and able to speak only imperfect Arabic, Eddé sought to link Lebanon's interests with those of France, not with the surrounding Arab states.

His bitter political rival, Bishara al-Khuri, was also a Paris-educated lawyer. Although he shared Eddé's belief in Lebanon's place as the Maronite homeland, al-Khuri was more sensitive to the Muslim community's needs and much more insistent on demanding that the French terminate the mandate. Recognizing that the state could not survive without Muslim-Christian cooperation, al-Khuri sought to build alliances with the Muslims based on common opposition to the French presence. His political organization, known as the Constitutional Bloc, actively agitated for complete independence. He hoped that by forming a united front against France, Muslims and Christians would bridge the gulf that separated them and establish mutual interests within the framework of a separate Lebanon.

It is ironic that it was Eddé who was given the opportunity to take an important first step in bringing Muslims to the center of political power. In 1936, French and Lebanese representatives agreed on a treaty similar to the one France and Syria had signed earlier in the year. The Franco-Lebanese treaty contained an annex that guaranteed "the fair representation of all the country's sects in the government and high administration."³ Expecting independence to follow shortly, the Lebanese chamber of deputies met in early 1937 and elected Eddé as president. Eddé selected a Muslim, Khayr al-Din al-Ahdab, as his prime minister. This was a key moment in Lebanese political life because it established the principle that the president of the republic would be a Maronite and the prime minister a Sunni Muslim. This power-sharing pattern remained an integral part of the Lebanese political system until the late 1980s.

Al-Ahdab's appointment served another important purpose: It prompted some Muslim leaders to realize that they could secure greater benefits by working within the system than by remaining outside it. With a Muslim as prime minister, Muslim notables gained easier access to the high commissioner's office, acquired more opportunities to dispense political patronage, and obtained increased support for their commercial ventures. Muslims' gradual reconciliation to the existence of Greater Lebanon was achieved through the evolution of a political system that recognized the country's sectarian diversity. Confessional politics allowed all communities to obtain representation in the chamber, and by allocating the presidency and the premiership to a Maronite and a Sunni, respectively, it made sure that no single community would dominate all the others.

Yet sectarian tensions did not suddenly vanish in the late 1930s. Maronites continued to regard Lebanon as a specifically Christian homeland and to stress Mediterranean over Pan-Arab ties; Muslims just as vigorously resisted these concepts and insisted that Lebanon was part of the wider Arab world. But despite ongoing communal conflict, the existence of Greater Lebanon was confirmed during the interwar years. The state survived under a distinctly Lebanese form of politics. The state did not, however, achieve the independence that the 1936 treaty with France promised. As happened in the case of Syria, the French chamber refused to ratify the treaty. At the onset of World War II, the high commissioner once again suspended the constitution and dissolved parliament. Lebanon's independence, like Syria's, had to await the fortunes of war.

SYRIA AND LEBANON DURING WORLD WAR II: THE TROUBLED PATH TO INDEPENDENCE

The fall of France in 1940 and the establishment of the collaborationist Vichy regime under Marshal Philippe Pétain had repercussions for France's overseas territories. Officials loyal to Pétain's government took over Syria and Lebanon's administrations, thus bringing the two Levant states within the Axis sphere of influence and making them the center of a diplomatic struggle involving the Vichy regime, the British government, and the Free French movement led by General Charles de Gaulle. In the course of this struggle among external powers, the local population endured economic deprivation, armed invasion, and political repression.

During the war's first two years, domestic political activity came to a virtual standstill. Worsening economic conditions exacerbated the frustrations caused by the suspension of both countries' constitutions; the British blockade of the Vichy-controlled eastern Mediterranean made itself felt in food shortages. Hunger marchers took to the streets in the major Syrian cities, and in spring 1941, demonstrators demanded the restoration of political life. These demonstrations quickly spread to the coastal cities of Lebanon. The Levant had become a cauldron of political unrest aggravated by economic hardship.

Meanwhile, Rommel's advance into Egypt and Rashid Ali's revolt in Iraq highlighted the danger the Vichy-commanded French army in the Levant posed to Britain's position in the crucial Middle Eastern theater. Determined to prevent Syria and Lebanon from becoming bases for German activity, Britain, immediately after crushing the Rashid Ali revolt, engaged in a joint invasion of the two countries with the Free French. By the end of July 1941, the operation had defeated the Vichy forces and placed the Free French in control. On the eve of the invasion, Britain and Free French leader de Gaulle had agreed on Syria and Lebanon's future status: the two states were to be granted immediate, unconditional independence. When de Gaulle's representative arrived in Beirut, the inhabitants of Syria and Lebanon once again prepared for independence.

They would be disappointed yet again, because the Free French regime was no more willing to confer sovereignty on the two Levant states than its predecessors had been. De Gaulle's belief in French imperial grandeur and his distrust of British motives in the Middle East prompted him to restore the mandate and to ignore the independence proclamation he had approved in summer 1941. This decision entangled the Free French administration in conflict not only with the Syrians and Lebanese but also with the British. The combination of popular unrest and British pressure finally compelled the French to restore both countries' constitutions and to hold elections in 1943, in which anti-French, pro-independence forces scored resounding victories.

In Syria, the old National Bloc was returned to power, and Shukri al-Quwwatli was elected president. Al-Quwwatli (b. 1891) came from a prosperous merchant-landowning family of Damascus and was representative of the political notables who had dominated Syrian politics for several decades. Al-Quwwatli straddled two eras: His postsecondary education in Istanbul stamped him as a member of the Ottoman order, whereas his participation in the Arab Revolt and his involvement in nationalist politics during the mandate marked him as an activist of the national period.

The Lebanese elections also brought established politicians to power; Bishara al-Khuri, a Maronite, became president and selected as prime minister his Sunni Muslim ally from the interwar years, Riyadh al-Sulh. Together these two worked out a compromise solution to the problem of Lebanese sectarianism and regional identity. Their agreement, known as the National Pact of 1943, attempted to assuage the Christians' fears of being absorbed into a larger Arab-Islamic state by recognizing Lebanon as a distinct entity; at the same time, the pact sought to satisfy Muslims by proclaiming that Lebanon had an Arab identity and that it would exist as part of the Arab world. Through this compromise, the Christian community accepted Lebanon's Arabness, and the Muslims acknowledged the country as a separate state and implicitly renounced any plans to seek a merger with other Arab states. The National Pact—in combination with the constitutional agreements of the late 1920s and the practices established in the 1930s—served as the framework for Lebanon's regional posture and domestic political structure until the civil war of 1975 undermined its assumptions.

In addition, the National Pact spelled out the formula for sectarian representation in the chamber of deputies. The formula was based on the census of 1932, a document nearly as important in Lebanese political life as the constitution. No further official census was taken, and political representation was frozen at the 1932 figures despite profound later demographic changes. The census determined that all Christians outnumbered all Muslims (including the Druze) by a ratio of six to five. Political power was then allocated according to this ratio. Thus, for every six Christian deputies in the chamber, there were five Muslim ones. Sectarian criteria also determined the composition of the cabinet; Maronites and Sunni Muslims were guaranteed two and sometimes three positions, and the other religions one position each. In this way, confessional politics became enshrined as the basis of the Lebanese system. From the very beginning, the Shi'a, with some 20 percent of the population, were underrepresented in the power-sharing structure.

Even though the elections of 1943 constituted a popular renunciation of any continued French interference in the domestic affairs of Syria and Lebanon, the French authorities refused to transfer power to the new local governments. In taking this position, France triggered a round of confrontations that did not end until 1945. General de Gaulle simply could not accept the possibility of terminating France's mission in the Levant, and his representatives continuously pressured the governments of Syria and Lebanon to sign treaties that would guarantee the primacy of French interests. As late as May 17, 1945, several days after the war in Europe had ended, France began to reinforce its garrisons in the Levant. If this act was intended to coerce Beirut and Damascus into concluding favorable treaties, it failed miserably. The specter of French troops disembarking on the Lebanese coast awakened memories of 1920 and was met with outbreaks of anti-French violence. The French forces retaliated by subjecting Damascus to a lengthy air and artillery bombardment, during which 400 inhabitants were killed. Active intervention by Britain brought about an armistice, and France agreed to drop its treaty demands and withdraw its forces. Syria was evacuated in spring 1946, and in December of that year, the last of the French troops left Lebanon.

Syria and Lebanon, formally recognized as independent in 1941, had been forced to wrest their sovereignty from a reluctant France. De Gaulle's efforts to prolong the mandate structure made the two states more determined than ever to assert their independence. Although both countries entered the postwar era with members of the old elite in power—al-Khuri and al-Sulh in Lebanon, al-Quwwatli in Syria—France's manipulation of domestic politics since the establishment of the mandates had denied these individuals experience in the practice of self-government and had not prepared them to deal with the challenges ahead.

NEW KINGDOM IN ARABIA: THE RISE OF THE SAUDI STATE

From the late eighteenth century through the interwar years, Great Britain was the leading European power along the shores of the Arabian Peninsula. As we have seen, Britain sought to protect its imperial communications by entering into a series of treaties with the ruling shaykhs of Kuwait, Bahrain, Qatar, and Oman and by bringing the peninsula's strategic southern tip under direct British control as the Aden Protectorate. Britain cared little about the interior as long as its shifting tribal confederations did not threaten the stability of the rulers along the coast.

At the conclusion of World War I, the British system of empire by treaty appeared to be fulfilling its goals in Arabia. Britain's key ally, Sharif Husayn, emerged from the war as king of the Hijaz, a much lesser status than he thought he had been promised but one he was forced to accept. However, Husayn's shortcomings as a ruler soon made him unpopular among the inhabitants of the Hijaz. Moreover, as the unwelcome mandate system replaced Ottoman rule in the Arab territories, Husayn came to be viewed as a traitor whose rebellion against the sultan-caliph had contributed to the Ottoman Empire's defeat and to the British and French occupation of its Arab provinces. Husayn's reputation deflated further when, a few days after Turkey's abolition of the caliphate in 1924, he claimed the title for himself. Muslims worldwide denounced this unilateral act, and their leaders proclaimed Husayn unworthy of Islam's most exalted position. The British became increasingly disillusioned with Husayn, regarding him as more of a troublesome liability than a useful ally. When a powerful force from the Arabian interior threatened his Hijazi kingdom, Britain limited its assistance to escorting Husayn into exile.

The origins of the new Arabian political order are to be found in the revival of the Wahhabi movement under the vigorous leadership of a remarkable warrior-statesman, Abd al-Aziz ibn Sa‘ud (1881–1953). The eighteenth-century alliance between Abd al-Wahhab's puritanical reformist doctrine and the military prowess of the house of Sa‘ud was discussed in Chapter 7. Although Muhammad Ali dispersed the movement, it was not eliminated. The political revival of Wahhabism began in 1902 when Ibn Sa‘ud seized the city of Riyadh, the stronghold of his principal rivals in the province of Najd. Ibn Sa‘ud's capture of Riyadh launched the twenty-year epic that brought this minor tribal chieftain to international stature as the ruler of a kingdom that bore his name.

In the period spanning 1902 to the end of World War I, Ibn Sa‘ud brought most of the Najd tribes under his authority. His success stemmed from his ability to combine his secular position as victorious tribal leader with his religious status as head of the Wahhabi order. First, as tradition demanded, the tribes were loyal to him in his capacity as a victorious commander. However, the history of Arabia had shown that such loyalty could be quickly withdrawn with any reversal in the tribal leader's military fortunes. Ibn Sa‘ud's formula was to provide another, higher level of commitment in the form of the puritanical Wahhabi doctrine. He achieved this by forcing the tribes to settle in small agricultural oasis communities, where he carried out the twin tasks of religious indoctrination and alliance building. He built mosques for the communities, sent ulama into them to disseminate the Wahhabi doctrine, and compelled the tribal shaykhs to attend a Wahhabi religious institute in Riyadh. At the same time, Ibn Sa‘ud provided the communities with material assistance in the form of agricultural supplies and arms. In return, the men of the settlements were expected to be at Ibn Sa‘ud’s call for military operations whenever he needed them. By persuading the tribes to adopt the practices and outlook of Wahhabism, Ibn Sa‘ud gave them a sense of communal loyalty that was more all-encompassing than the customary tribal alliances. The Ikhwan (Brethren) became imbued with a sense of mission, a desire to extend the Wahhabi doctrine and way of life to other areas of the peninsula. Their commitment to Ibn Sa‘ud’s success was intimately bound to their commitment to the expansion of Wahhabism.

The postwar settlement, in particular Britain’s installation of Husayn’s sons on the thrones of Iraq and Transjordan, piqued Ibn Sa‘ud’s suspicions that a Hashimite federation was hemming him in. In 1924, he led his Ikhwan warriors into the Hijaz, seizing Mecca and Medina and driving Sharif Husayn into exile. Arabia had a new ruler, the head of the house of Sa‘ud and the head of the Wahhabi religious order; it has remained under the direction of those forces to the present day.

Britain, quickly responding to the new realities of Arabian politics, negotiated an agreement with Ibn Sa‘ud in 1927. Known as the Treaty of Jiddah, it recognized Ibn Sa‘ud as the sovereign king of the Hijaz and sultan of Najd and its dependencies; he, in turn, acknowledged Britain’s special relationships with the coastal rulers and pledged to respect their domains. In 1932, the name of the state was officially changed to the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia. By that time, it had received international recognition from the community of nations.

Ibn Sa‘ud now concentrated on consolidating his rule and establishing the instruments of central authority. His success has prompted one scholar to place him “among the modern world’s greatest nation-builders.”⁴ With consummate skill, the king utilized force, negotiation, marriage alliances, religious values, and the powerful appeal of his personal example to forge a territorial state out of warring tribal factions. He was a tall and imposing figure, a warrior-king out of an earlier, more heroic era. As astute as he was brave, he proved to be a fair and judicious ruler whose piety, dignity, and accessibility won his subjects' allegiance. A masterful tribal politician, he ruled less as an absolutist than as a first among equals. He respected existing customs and consulted regularly with the tribal shaykhs, preferring to resolve disputes through persuasion rather than coercion.

A rudimentary governmental apparatus took shape in Riyadh, and the administration introduced such instruments of central control as radio, mechanized transportation, and aircraft. Bureaucrats from other Arab countries and members of the Sa‘udi family staffed the government offices. The king’s own marriage alliances alone produced forty-one sons, allowing Ibn Sa‘ud to make the royal family a true ruling house whose members viewed their welfare and that of the kingdom as identical. During these formative years, the monarch and his offspring enjoyed few luxuries. Today’s image of Saudi Arabia as a nation awash in oil wealth does not apply to the interwar era. Ibn Sa‘ud ruled over an impoverished kingdom whose main revenue was derived from the annual pilgrimage to Mecca. Sustained oil exploration began only in 1933 when the government signed a concession agreement with Standard Oil of California, the future Arabian American Oil Company (ARAMCO). Oil was not discovered until 1938, and the outbreak of World War II delayed the development of the Saudi petroleum industry until the late 1940s.

During World War II, Saudi Arabia remained officially neutral until March 1945, when Riyadh declared war on Germany. However, as early as 1940, Ibn Sa‘ud announced his support for Britain, and his kingdom cooperated with the Allied countries. Such cooperation was due, in part, to Arabia’s dependence on the Allies. The war years were terribly difficult for Saudi Arabia, as the number of persons making the annual pilgrimage to Mecca declined precipitously, causing revenues to plunge. Britain provided direct subsidies to keep the country afloat, and the United States extended indirect ones. Indeed, the wartime hardships may have paved the way to the prosperity of the following decades. The US government became concerned over the depletion of US-based oil supplies during the war and renewed its efforts to expand its oil operations in Saudi Arabia.

Following World War II, Ibn Sa‘ud’s status differed from that of other Arab rulers and conferred on him a legitimacy they lacked. He had won his kingdom through his own efforts, and unlike his Hashimite rivals, he was not tainted by association with European support. Nor could anyone accuse him of allowing the imposition of an imported European secular constitution on his domains; instead, his rule embodied the indigenous traditions of Wahhabi Islam and tribal politics. Although the administrative structure of the kingdom emerged from decrees Ibn Sa‘ud issued on a variety of subjects, the Saudi legal system was based on the shari‘ah. The king’s attention to the upkeep of the holy cities and the care he took to facilitate the annual pilgrimage to Mecca further enhanced Saudi Arabia’s reputation as an exemplary Islamic state. Each of the king’s attributes worked together to empower him to fashion a unitary state in Arabia. That state remained tribal, conservative, and inward looking, but its very existence was an achievement, and its durability is a tribute to the foundations laid by Ibn Sa‘ud.

THE SEARCH FOR IDENTITY: REGIONALISM, ARABISM, ISLAM

The interwar situation in the Middle East required a refashioning of the political and communal loyalties of the Arabs. Ottomanism had been defeated and the institutions of Islam—including the unifying symbol of the caliphate—were under attack by Atatürk’s relentless secularism. But what was to replace these established pillars of communal identity? What elements of the Arab heritage could best be used as symbols around which to rally popular resistance to the European occupation and to construct a positive image of Arab identity? During the interwar period, three broad responses to these questions dominated political and intellectual discourse: regionalism, Pan-Arab unity, and Islamic solidarity.

Regionalists frequently sought to construct a local nationalist mythology by connecting a specific region to its ancient pre-Islamic past. We have already seen the example of pharaonism, which found certain Egyptian authors arguing for the existence of a distinct Egyptian identity based on the heritage of the Nile Valley. In Syria, a similar current of regional nationalism infused the writings of Antun Sa‘adah (1904–1949), a Lebanese Christian who founded the Syrian Social Nationalist Party (SSNP) in Beirut in 1932. Deploring the divisions the French had imposed on Greater Syria, Sa‘adah called for the reunification of the country. At the same time, he insisted that Syria was a distinct nation in itself, with a rich history dating back to the ancient Phoenicians, and that it should therefore not become part of a unified Arab state. Sa‘adah was a Syrian regional nationalist, believing that Syrian history transcended Arab, Islamic, and Christian history and that Syria, as a separate national entity, was the product of the region’s unique geographical and historical features since ancient times.

A more pragmatic regionalism was evident in the policies adopted by the ruling elite of the mandate territories. Seeking to solidify their fragile hold on power, these ruling groups, whether Faysal and the ex-Ottoman officers in Iraq or the urban notables of Syria, believed their primary task was to generate popular feelings of identification with and support for their fledgling regimes. To achieve their objective, they not only had to establish regional administrations; they also had to create new symbols of state nationalism to reflect the changed realities. Thus, the introduction of flags, postage stamps, and national anthems emphasized each state’s distinctiveness and solidified the political divisions Britain and France had imposed on the Arab world.

Some thinkers condemned the politicians’ regional nationalist programs as self-serving and argued that the continued fragmentation of the Arabs would condemn them to perpetual weakness in the international order. For these opponents of regionalism, what was needed was the unification of the separate Arab states into a single political entity. The most intellectually compelling spokesman of Arab unity was Sati al-Husri (1880–1968), a former Ottoman educator (see Chapter 8) who spent the interwar years in Baghdad overseeing the establishment of the Iraqi educational system. In articles and speeches and later in books with such titles as Arabism First, On Arab Nationalism, and What Is Nationalism?, al-Husri argued that the Arabs constituted a nation and therefore ought to be united into a single state. For him, the fundamental criteria of nationhood were a shared language and a common history. Different peoples could therefore form a cultural nation even if they were politically divided. Of the two prerequisites for nationhood, the more significant was language, which al-Husri regarded as the critical spiritual bond among human beings. United culturally by the Arabic language and by shared memories of their glorious past, the Arabs possessed all the components of nationhood, even if the Arab nation was at the time divided into several political states. Using examples from European history, al-Husri attempted to demonstrate the inevitability of cultural nationalism to create unified nation-states. What was needed in the present circumstances—and what al-Husri endeavored to provide—was an awareness of shared Arabism. Once this awareness was developed, Arabs would be inspired to seek political unification. Profoundly opposed to the regionalism of Taha Husayn and Antun Sa‘adah, al-Husri ridiculed pharaonism, contending that Egypt was an integral part of the Arab nation and proposing that it act as the Prussia and Piedmont of Arabism.

Al-Husri’s definition of Arab nationalism was noteworthy for its clarity and uncompromising secularism. Refusing to employ Islamic symbols in his call for unity, he argued that the Arabic language had existed before Islam and that all who spoke Arabic, whether they were Muslim or Christian, should have but one loyalty: to the Arab nation. Although al-Husri’s doctrine of nationalism was widely endorsed and helped to keep alive the ideal of a unified Arab nation toward which all Arabs should strive, it has remained a largely unfulfilled vision.

A third major focus of Arab political and cultural identity during the interwar period was Islamic solidarity. Throughout most of the 1920s, the voices of Islamic activism were muted. This was the decade of the secular Wafdist triumph in Egypt, of Atatürk’s reforms in Turkey, and of domestic uncertainty in the mandate states. Toward the end of the decade, however, popular disillusionment with the imported constitutional systems and with the politicians who manipulated them led to a search for more representative ideologies. At the same time, the full impact of Atatürk’s secularist program had become alarmingly obvious, as had the determination of Britain and France to retain long-term control over their mandate territories. The Islamic order appeared to be in danger of extinction. In these circumstances, appeals for the defense of Islamic values against Europe and against the actions of local Europeanized politicians found a receptive audience. The success of the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt and the satisfaction voiced over Ibn Sa‘ud’s triumph in Arabia are evidence of this renewed current of Islamic awareness.

One intellectual dimension of interwar Islam was represented by the Salafiyyah reformist movement in Egypt. Its leading spokesman, Rashid Rida (1865–1935), was a disciple of Muhammad Abduh. In his journal al-Manar (The Beacon), Rida continued Abduh’s practice of seeking an accommodation between Islamic principles and practical innovation. But he became more protective of tradition than receptive to reform. Although al-Manar continued to be received throughout the Islamic community as an authoritative voice on issues of religion and society, the Salafiyyah movement as a whole lost touch with Abduh’s efforts to reconcile Islam to modernism and instead adopted an outlook more akin to Wahhabism and to the conservatism of al-Azhar.

Rida’s writings did not inspire popular emotions. That task was filled in the field of Islamic activism by Amir Shakib Arslan (1869–1946), a strongly pro-Ottoman Lebanese Druze notable (see Chapter 8). Arslan passed most of the interwar years in exile in Geneva serving as Syria and Palestine’s unofficial representative at the League of Nations and writing articles for the periodical press of the Arab countries. Less a theologian than an activist in the tradition of Jamal al-Din al-Afghani, Arslan advocated a militant Islam charged with political and moral assertiveness. He sought to reconstruct the bonds of Islamic solidarity by reminding Muslims from Morocco to Iraq that, despite their diversity, they were united by their common adherence to Islam; if they would only recognize this bond and act on it, they would achieve liberation from their current oppression and restoration of their splendid past. His Islamic-inspired anti-imperial propaganda campaigns were a constant irritant to British and French officials and helped create awareness among people across the Arab Islamic world of their common cause.

In addition to believing in the value of Islamic solidarity as a bulwark against European imperialism, Arslan defended Islam as an essential component of social morality. A staunch opponent of Atatürk, Arslan wrote that the callous disregard of cultural tradition would undermine the spiritualism that made Eastern civilization superior to the shallowly materialistic West. He deplored the neglect of shari‘ah-inspired moral commandments and claimed that only by adhering to Islam’s true tenets would Muslims experience the regeneration necessary to recover their proper place in the world. Arslan's message, with its call to action and its defense of traditional values at a time of grave uncertainty, attracted positive and widespread attention during the 1920s and 1930s.

CONCLUSION

These three expressions of identity—regionalism, Pan-Arab nationalism, and Islamic solidarity—suggest the variety of alternatives that circulated through the Arab Middle East following the collapse of the Ottoman-Islamic order. In the end, neither Pan-Arab unity nor Islamic solidarity could subsume the state nationalisms favored by the new political elite seeking to build their own local power bases. Whether upstart monarchs or insecure prime ministers, the members of this elite maintained their positions by walking a narrow tightrope between resistance and cooperation, knowing always that their failure to oppose the European presence exposed them to popular resentment and possible overthrow and that their failure to cooperate with the all-powerful high commissioner made them susceptible to dismissal at his pleasure. With few exceptions, the regional political elite eschewed Pan-Arabism, endorsing it in principle only, in favor of constructing local alliances that might perpetuate their dominance in the event of the withdrawal of the high commissioner and his staff.

THE PALESTINE MANDATE AND THE BIRTH OF THE STATE OF ISRAEL

The territory that composed the British mandate for Palestine was only slightly larger than the state of Massachusetts. Yet the repercussions of developments in and attitudes toward this small piece of southern Syria have reverberated throughout the Middle East and the world at large, shaping regional and Great Power relationships, influencing US and European domestic politics, generating five wars, creating over 1 million refugees, and producing deep misunderstandings and bitterness. Historians have offered numerous perspectives on why the mandate became the source of so much discord. To some, the failure to resolve the conflict between Jewish immigration and the preservation of Palestinian Arab rights rests with the indecisiveness and biases of the British governments that held power for over thirty years (1917–1948). Others argue that the question is not one of failure but of triumph—the triumph of the Zionist immigrants and their supporters in overcoming Arab resistance, British opposition, and European anti-Semitism to forge the state of Israel against seemingly overwhelming odds. Another group of historians poses different questions: Why did the solidly established indigenous Arab inhabitants, settled on the land and dominant in the urban administration of Palestine for centuries and possessing a population majority of approximately eight to one in 1922, become a minority within the new Israeli state in 1948? Why did Zionism, not Arabism or Palestinian nationalism, win the day in Palestine? Did the Palestinian Arab leadership perform its tasks adequately? Were its members prepared to cope with the multitude of international issues they faced? And were they credible representatives of the Palestinian Arab population at large?

This chapter examines the interactions among the British, the Zionists, and the Palestinian Arabs so as to illustrate the main issues of the mandate era. We should keep in mind from the outset the unique premise on which the mandate for Palestine was founded: A third party (Great Britain) promised a small territory that an Arab majority had inhabited for some 1,200 years as a national home to another people (the international Jewish community), the majority of whom lived in Eastern Europe. The oppressed conditions of East European Jews prompted the Zionists among them to take up Britain's promise and to attempt to construct in Palestine a Jewish national home; at the same time, Palestine's established Arab community opposed the notion of turning its homeland into a Jewish state and, to the extent it was able to do so, resisted the process. The Zionist claims to the same territory inhabited by Palestinian Arabs lay at the root of the conflict over Palestine.

THE EMERGENCE OF POLITICAL ZIONISM

Through the centuries since their dispersion from Palestine by the Roman conquest of the first century, the Jewish communities of Europe kept alive the idea of a return to the Holy Land. Palestine occupied so central a place in Jewish religious culture because of the belief that the establishment of the Kingdom of Israel after the Exodus represented the fulfillment of God's promise to the Jews that they were chosen to complete their destiny in Zion. Historical memories of the reigns of David and Solomon intermingled with aspects of religious belief and ritual to create a sustained vision of the ultimate redemption of the Jewish people through a return to the Holy Land. More tangible needs also kept alive this dream of the return. Discriminated against by governments and individuals alike, European Jews faced restrictions forbidding them from entering certain professions, denying them access to universities, barring them from state employment, and confining them to specific areas of residence. In the face of oppression and prejudice, the belief in an eventual return to Zion offered Jewry a measure of hope with which to endure the hard reality of the Diaspora. Yet although the sentiment of Zionism was deeply ingrained in Jewish religious life, it received little organizational expression until the late nineteenth century.

The forces that gave rise to organized political Zionism were spawned by conditions in nineteenth-century Europe. During the era of liberal nationalism, the states of Western Europe gradually adopted legislation to provide for the legal emancipation of the Jews. With emancipation came assimilation, as Jews moved into middle-class occupations and increasingly identified themselves as citizens rather than members of a distinctive religious community. Although many Jews, especially in Germany, where emancipation had made the most progress, looked upon assimilation as the process that would end anti-Semitism, others regretted the dilution of the bonds of communal identity and the decline of religious observance that resulted.

If developments in Western Europe appeared to favor the integration of Jews into national life, the situation in Eastern Europe was starkly different. In Russia and Poland, the main centers of Diaspora Jewry, active persecution of the Jewish communities intensified during the late nineteenth century. The reigns of Alexander III (1881–1894) and Nicholas II (1894–1917) were marked by a series of pogroms tacitly encouraged by the government. Cruelly oppressed and harassed, millions of East European Jews sought a new life by immigrating to the United States. For others, Zionism—specifically, a new, political Zionism inspired as much by nationalism as by religious belief—offered an alternative hope for escape from persecution.

Modern political Zionism—Jewish nationalism focusing on Palestine—originated in Russia, the locus of virulent anti-Semitism. Following the pogroms of the early 1880s, Jewish groups formed with the specific objective of assisting Jewish settlement in Palestine. In 1884, these scattered groups were organized under a central coordinating agency and took the name the Lovers of Zion. During the 1880s and 1890s, the Lovers of Zion sponsored small agricultural settlements in Palestine, but the enterprise suffered from lack of funds, and the settlements were not very successful. Despite its difficulties, this early settlement movement has assumed a prominent place in the historical consciousness of modern Israelis and is regarded as the first of several aliyahs, or waves of settlement, that contributed to the eventual creation of the state of Israel. In 1882, at the height of the pogroms, a seminal treatise in the history of political Zionism appeared. Entitled Autoemancipation and written by Leo Pinsker (d. 1891), the booklet argued that anti-Semitism was so deeply embedded in European society that no matter what the laws said about emancipation, Jews would never be treated as equals. To end their perpetually alien status, Jews had to seize their own destiny and establish an independent Jewish state. Pinsker was more interested in issues of national identity than of religion, and he did not insist that the Jewish state be in Palestine. However, his call for action appealed to young Russian Jews, and in the 1890s, various Zionist organizations emerged, each with its own solution to the problems of Jewish identity and persecution. At this stage, Zionism was an uncoordinated movement without direction.

Theodor Herzl (1860–1904) did not originate the idea of Zionism, but through his energy and determination, he forged the existing strands of the ideology into a coherent international movement. Born into a middle-class Jewish family in Budapest, Herzl grew up in an assimilated environment. After obtaining a law degree from the University of Vienna, he worked as a journalist for a prestigious Viennese newspaper. Herzl's experiences as a correspondent in various Western European cities convinced him that anti-Semitism was such a deeply rooted prejudice that it could never be eliminated by legislation. He saw emancipation as a facade designed to mask—but not to remove—anti-Jewish sentiments. Driven by this belief, Herzl wrote The Jewish State (1896), which provided the ideological basis for political Zionism. Perfectly suited to its era, The Jewish State was as much a treatise on nationalism as on religion. Herzl's thesis was that the Jews constituted a nation but lacked a political state within which they could freely express their national culture. These two factors—the existence of a Jewish nationality and the absence of a Jewish state—combined to make the Jews aliens in the lands in which they lived and contributed to their oppression by the dominant cultural majority. In Herzl's opinion, the only resolution to this problem and to the problem of anti-Semitism in general was for the Jews to acquire political sovereignty in a state of their own, thereby liberating their nationality from its perpetually subordinate status. Like his predecessor, Pinsker, Herzl was motivated more by the pragmatic considerations of nationhood than by the religious associations of the Old Testament, and he did not specify Palestine as the location of the future Jewish state.

The Jewish State had an electrifying effect on East European Jewry and provided Zionism with a clearly stated political objective. Encouraged by the response to his book, Herzl undertook to organize the various strands of Zionism into a single unified movement. Largely because of his efforts, the first Zionist Congress was convened in Basel in 1897. It attracted over 200 delegates and represented a milestone for the Zionist movement. The congress adopted a program stating that the objective of Zionism was to secure a legally recognized home in Palestine for the Jewish people. Equally important, the Basel congress agreed to establish the World Zionist Organization as the central administrative organ of the Zionist movement and to set up a structure of committees to give it cohesion and direction. In the years following the meeting at Basel, branches of the central congress were set up throughout Eastern Europe, and a grassroots campaign to gather popular support was undertaken. The Zionist Congress met annually after 1897, and although the sessions often revealed deep divisions within Zionism, Herzl succeeded in attracting more and more delegates to each congress.

Notwithstanding the growing participation of East European Jewry in Zionist activities, Herzl recognized that the movement would not succeed until it secured the diplomatic support of a Great Power and the financial assistance of members of the Western Jewish community. Herzl was to be disappointed on both counts. The assimilated Jewish establishments in Western Europe and the United States feared that the assertion of Jewish distinctiveness—an integral part of Zionism—would produce an anti-Semitic backlash that might threaten their position in society. Moreover, Sultan Abdul Hamid II opposed the idea of large-scale European Jewish settlement in Ottoman territory, and no European power was inclined to support a movement that did not offer diplomatic advantages. Thus, by the time of his death in 1904, Herzl had infused Zionism with his own energy and provided it with a viable organizational structure, but he had not obtained the external governmental backing needed to fulfill the Basel program of establishing a legally recognized home for the Jewish people in Palestine. During World War I, however, the diplomatic status of Zionism would improve dramatically.

THE BALFOUR DECLARATION

As noted in Chapter 9, the Ottoman decision to enter the war on Germany's side prompted Britain, France, and Russia to plan for the partition of Ottoman territories in the event of an Allied victory. The British pledge to Sharif Husayn of Mecca and the Sykes-Picot Agreement between Britain and France constituted two of the principal proposals for dividing the Ottoman Empire among the Allies. The Balfour Declaration was another partition scheme; the fact that it was issued unilaterally by Britain and that France and Sharif Husayn viewed it as contravening the agreements Britain had already made with them made it all the more complex.

During the course of World War I, several factors combined to bring the question of Zionism to the attention of the British cabinet. The most pressing was the belief, held by several key government officials, that Jewish groups in the United States and Russia had the capacity to influence their respective governments' attitudes toward the war. Until the United States declared war on Germany in April 1917, the British cabinet worried that Germany might make a declaration in support of Zionist aims and thus attract a sympathetic response from US Jewry. A similar consideration arose with regard to Russia, which was on the verge of military collapse and social revolution by autumn 1917. British government officials argued that a British gesture of goodwill toward Zionist aspirations might persuade influential Jewish members within the revolutionary movement to attempt to keep Russia in the war. Though ill founded, these various beliefs helped determine British policy.

Chaim Weizmann, the Zionist spokesman in London, also played a significant role in British policymaking. The Russian-born Weizmann (1874–1952) was educated at universities in Berlin and Fribourg, Switzerland, where he received his doctorate in chemistry. He had been attracted to Zionism while a student in Berlin and had traveled extensively through the Russian pale of settlement, establishing local branches of the World Zionist Organization. Appointed to the Department of Chemistry at the University of Manchester in 1904, Weizmann continued his activities in the Zionist cause and set up contacts with leading figures among the British political establishment. Persuasive and persistent, Weizmann was effective in keeping the question of Zionism before the British cabinet and in cultivating ties with well-placed officials and public figures. The cabinet's recognition that British support for Zionism had the potential to serve British imperial interests helped him immensely in his task. Britain's sponsorship of Jewish settlement in Palestine would require a British presence in the region and would thus keep France out of an area that was contiguous to the vital Suez Canal zone.

All of these factors—the search to cement wartime alliances, Weizmann's skillful persistence, the existence of a certain sympathy within the cabinet toward the religious and humanitarian aspects of Zionism, and, most important, the chance to secure British strategic interests—interacted to produce a British declaration in support of Zionist objectives in Palestine. On November 2, 1917, the British foreign secretary, Arthur Balfour, wrote to Lord Rothschild, a prominent figure in British Zionist circles, informing him that the cabinet had approved the following declaration of sympathy for Jewish Zionist aspirations:

His Majesty's Government view with favour the establishment in Palestine of a National Home for the Jewish people, and will use their best endeavours to facilitate the achievement of this object, it being clearly understood that nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine, or the rights and political status enjoyed by Jews in any other country.¹

This was the fateful Balfour Declaration, a brief document filled with such ambiguities and contradictions that it confused all the parties named in it.

THE MANDATE FOR PALESTINE: BRITISH ADMINISTRATION

The territory that became the Palestine mandate was not a distinctive administrative entity during the Ottoman era (see Map 13.1). Regarded as part of southern Syria, it was divided between the provinces of Beirut and Damascus and the special administrative unit of Jerusalem. The British capture of Jerusalem in December 1917 led to Britain's military occupation of Palestine from 1917 to 1920. During these years, Britain sought to reconcile the conflicting aspirations of Zionism and Arabism by facilitating discussions between Weizmann and the era's leading Arab personality, Faisal of Syria. In a January 1919 agreement, Weizmann pledged that the Jewish community would cooperate with the Arabs in Palestine's economic development. In return, Faisal would recognize the Balfour Declaration and consent to Jewish immigration, provided that the rights of the Palestinian Arabs were protected and Arab demands for an independent Greater Syria were recognized. Faisal did not, as some have claimed, agree to the creation of a Jewish state in Palestine. When the French occupied Syria, the provisions of the Faisal-Weizmann agreement were violated and the document became void.

Meanwhile, the San Remo Conference (1920) awarded Britain the mandate for Palestine, and a civilian administration replaced the military government. Three years later the newly created League of Nations gave formal sanction to the mandate and added provisions that raised Zionist expectations and alarmed the Arab inhabitants; the terms of the league mandate incorporated the Balfour Declaration and recognized Hebrew as an official language in Palestine.

The appointment of Sir Herbert Samuel as civilian high commissioner in 1920 further encouraged the Zionists. Samuel was Jewish and an ardent Zionist, and he interpreted his task as facilitating the establishment of the Jewish national home. But what, precisely, did that term mean? Weizmann had no doubts: At the Paris Peace Conference, he stated that the Zionist objective was gradually to make Palestine as Jewish as England was English. In short, the Zionists interpreted the term national home to mean a Jewish state, and they expected the British administration to cooperate in its creation. But Britain had not committed itself to the establishment of a Jewish state in Palestine. For, after all, in the Balfour Declaration, Britain had also pledged to uphold the rights and privileges of the “existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine,” a dismissive way of referring to the 668,258 Arab inhabitants who constituted over 85 percent of the population. This was the duty of equal obligation, and it became the insoluble contradiction in the Balfour Declaration. How could Britain facilitate the establishment of a Jewish national home on the one hand and ensure that the rights of the Arab majority would not be threatened on the other? For the full twenty-eight years of the mandate, this question haunted British policymakers; in the end, they could not find a satisfactory answer.

In an attempt to clarify its future plans in Palestine, the British government issued a White Paper in 1922 that informed British policy during most of the 1920s. The document illustrates the balancing act Britain attempted to perform. To placate the Arab community, the White Paper stated that the development of a Jewish national home did not mean the imposition of Jewish nationality upon the entire Palestinian population. However, it also conceded certain Zionist demands by declaring that the Jewish people had a right to be in Palestine and that Palestine should become a center in which the Jewish people as a whole could take pride on the grounds of religion and race. If the White Paper was intended to remove the ambiguities of the Balfour Declaration, it failed utterly.

In conjunction with the special administrative difficulties posed by the existence of the policy of dual obligation, the Palestine mandate presented Britain with the challenge of fulfilling the essential obligations of a mandatory power—namely, to establish the instruments of self-government that would enable the mandate to achieve independence. But what was an independent Palestine to be? High Commissioner Samuel held that the most desirable outcome was the creation of an integrated political community, and he proposed several schemes for the development of a unitary state. He believed that without Arab political participation, the mandate would be unworkable. Moreover, if the Arab leadership could be persuaded to participate in the governance of the mandate, it would imply Arab acceptance of the Balfour Declaration. The high commissioner was also motivated by a sincere belief that Jewish-Arab cooperation would improve the Arab standard of living.

His first constitutional proposal called for the creation of a legislative council composed of elected Muslim, Christian, and Jewish representatives plus eleven members nominated by the high commissioner. However, the Arab leaders rejected the plan, declaring that they would not serve in any constitutional government that did not annul the Balfour Declaration. Samuel tried to forge ahead with elections, but the Arab community boycotted them, and the constitutional plan was shelved in 1923. Samuel then attempted to form an advisory council consisting of ten Arab and two Jewish representatives nominated by the high commissioner. This proposal also failed, as the Arab nominees were pressured into refusing to serve.

The Arab rejection of Samuel's proposals for unitary representation was of the utmost significance in determining the mandate's future course because it meant that the high commissioner and his officials alone governed Palestine. Institutions representing the population as a whole were completely lacking: Palestine never had a constitution, a parliament, or mandate-wide elections. The Arab and Jewish communities, rather than jointly participating in the development of "national" institutions, became increasingly hostile to one another. Each community developed its own political apparatus and engaged in its own separate spheres of economic activity. These practices strengthened the communal solidarity within each community but widened the gap between them.

THE PALESTINIAN ARAB COMMUNITY: LEADERSHIP AND INSTITUTIONS

The Arab Executive

In the interwar period, Palestinian Arab leadership was assumed by local urban notables whose power and prestige rested on their ownership of land and their domination of religious and municipal offices. As was the case with other interwar Arab politicians in the British and French mandates, the Palestinian notables sought to preserve their social and political preeminence by adopting a policy of moderate opposition to and cautious cooperation with the British authorities. They were aided in retaining their influence by the British preference for working within the existing social order and using the established notable families as intermediaries between the government and the population at large. Thus, in Palestine as elsewhere in the former Ottoman Arab provinces, the politics of the notables survived into the post-Ottoman era.

However, the existence of the Balfour Declaration and the encouragement of Jewish immigration set Palestine apart from the other Arab mandates and created a complex challenge for the Palestinian elite. Not only did they have to confront British imperialism, Zionist determination, and the demands of their own constituents within the mandate's frontiers, but they also had to present the Palestinian case in the corridors of power in London, where none of them commanded the respect and influence accorded to Weizmann. They were provincial notables into whose hands was placed one of the most intractable problems of the twentieth century. Although their numbers included individuals of outstanding talent and dedication, their collective leadership was weakened by factionalism and a tendency to overlook the importance of forming a cohesive political organization that could attract popular support.

The first organized Palestinian Arab response to the postwar settlement came from local Muslim-Christian associations that were formed in large towns during 1918 and 1919. About thirty delegates from these associations gathered in Jerusalem in late 1919 and constituted themselves as the first Palestinian Arab Congress. Thereafter, the congress met annually and adopted resolutions on matters affecting the relationships among the Arab community, the Zionists, and the British. At the Third Congress, held in 1920, a standing Arab Executive was created under the presidency of Musa Kazim al-Husayni, a former mayor of Jerusalem. The Arab Executive claimed to represent all Palestinians, but the British refused to accept it as a properly elected body and only occasionally acknowledged its legitimacy.

This British attitude undermined the Arab Executive's ability to channel communication effectively between the Arabs and the mandate government. An additional problem for the Arab Executive was that both the standing executive and the branches of Muslim-Christian associations remained loose coalitions without an extensive administrative apparatus and lacked instruments of popular mobilization. Thus, the Arab Executive failed to secure either mass support or formal access to the high commissioner. When Musa Kazim al-Husayni died in 1934, the Arab Executive ceased to exist.

The Arab Executive in particular and Palestinian political activity in general was further weakened by the bitter rivalry between two leading Muslim families of Jerusalem, the Nashashibis and the al-Husaynis. Their competition for power within Palestine dated from the nineteenth century and was intensified during the mandate, adding a destructive factionalism to the politics of the Arab elite. This factionalism was not entirely self-induced; the British, aware of the rivalry, used their power over appointments to maintain the divisions between the two families. Thus, in 1920, Raghib Nashashibi replaced an al-Husayni as mayor of Jerusalem. The following year, the British counterbalanced this Nashashibi gain by securing the selection of Hajj Amin al-Husayni as mufti of Jerusalem. Reportedly Raghib Bey responded to Hajj Amin's appointment by declaring that he would oppose any position the mufti took. He and his supporters would carry out this threat, even when it was clearly detrimental to the Palestinian cause.

Hajj Amin al-Husayni and the Supreme Muslim Council

As mufti of Jerusalem, Hajj Amin (1895–1974) occupied the most prestigious religious office in Palestine. He used it to build a political network that made him the acknowledged leader of the Palestinian Arab community during the interwar period.

The mufti of Jerusalem was traditionally responsible for regulating Islamic affairs within the greater Jerusalem district. With the termination of Ottoman authority and the creation of the Palestinian mandate, the British expanded the mufti's jurisdiction to include all of Palestine, thus providing the office with considerable influence in the Muslim community. Raised in his native Jerusalem, Hajj Amin studied at both al-Azhar in Cairo and the Imperial War College in Istanbul. He served behind the lines in Anatolia during World War I and eventually became an Ottoman army officer. Shocked by the Balfour Declaration, he organized anti-Zionist demonstrations in the immediate postwar period. Despite his opposition to the declaration, he appeared willing to cooperate with the British in preventing violence and was thus Samuel's preferred candidate for the office of mufti.

The mufti's authority greatly expanded in 1921 when Samuel created the Supreme Muslim Council, an autonomous body charged with managing the entire range of Islamic institutions within the mandate. Hajj Amin was appointed president of the council in 1922. In his twin capacities as mufti of Jerusalem and president of the Supreme Muslim Council, he acquired control of a vast patronage network. The council was responsible for the supervision of the shari‘ah courts and the appointment of court officials and judges; for the management of waqfs, the assignment of waqf funds, and the appointment of waqf trustees; and for the system of Islamic religious schools, including the selection of teachers. The council paid these officials out of an annual budget (ranging from £50,000 to £60,000 during the 1920s) provided by the mandatory government. Hajj Amin used his powers of appointment and dismissal to secure positions for his supporters and to prevent his opponents, especially the Nashashibi family and its clients, from obtaining employment within the religious establishment. In this manner, the mufti transformed his religious authority into the most extensive Arab political organization in Palestine.

Although Hajj Amin has been vilified by Zionists and glorified by certain Arab nationalists, his political behavior up to 1936 was more moderate than either group acknowledges. He was too pragmatic a politician to allow his opposition to Zionism to deceive him into thinking that an Arab uprising could dislodge the British. He also recognized that his own continued tenure depended upon British goodwill. Therefore, until the outbreak of violence in 1936, the mufti urged restraint from his followers and demonstrated a willingness to cooperate with the British in seeking a negotiated solution to the question of Jewish immigration.

THE JEWISH COMMUNITY: LEADERSHIP AND INSTITUTIONS

The Jewish Agency and the National Council

Zionist organizations were notably more extensive than Arab organizations and reflected the differences in the resources that the two communities could marshal. The Jewish community was better organized, better financed, and better connected than the Arabs. Whereas there was no formally recognized body of Arab representatives empowered to present the Palestinian Arab case to the high commissioner, Zionist access to British authority was sanctioned by the mandate, which authorized the formation of a public body to consult with the mandatory government on matters affecting the establishment of the Jewish national home. To fulfill this function, the World Zionist Organization created the Palestine Zionist Executive in 1921, reorganized as the Jewish Agency in 1929. The Jewish Agency became the quasi-government of the Jewish community in Palestine, managing services that ranged from banking to health care to immigrant settlement. The chairman of the Jewish Agency had regular access to the high commissioner and other British officials.

Jewish communal affairs were conducted through a hierarchy of representative organizations. The national assembly, constituted in 1920, was an elected body of some 300 delegates who selected from among themselves the members of the national council, or Va'ad Leumi. The council was empowered to make administrative decisions on behalf of the Jewish community and was treated by the mandate government as the legitimate representative of Palestinian Jewry.

Histadrut: The Political and Ideological Impact of the Labor Movement

Of the various organizations formed to generate self-sufficiency within the Yishuv (the name of the Jewish community in Palestine before 1948), the most important was Histadrut, the Federation of Jewish Labor. Founded in 1920 to promote Jewish trade unionism, Histadrut gradually widened its role during the interwar years and came to engage in an extensive range of entrepreneurial activities and to exercise a decisive influence on the ideology and politics of both the Yishuv and the future state of Israel. To provide employment for its members, Histadrut created public works projects and founded companies that, by the 1930s, included shipping, agricultural marketing, road and housing construction, banking, and insurance. Because one of its objectives was to ensure the self-sufficiency of Jewish labor and produce, Histadrut instituted a boycott of Arab workers and Arab products.

Histadrut also had ties with the kibbutz workers in the agricultural sector. The kibbutzim were collective agricultural settlements in which all property belonged to the community and all responsibilities were shared equally by the members. They became a symbol of the cooperative communal order many early Zionists hoped to build in Palestine. Together, Histadrut and the kibbutz movement also represented the ideal of Jewish rejuvenation through the dignity of labor and working the land. This was a significant impulse within the Yishuv and imparted to the community a socialist economic orientation and a glorification of the new Jewish self-image in which the passive and oppressed ghetto dwellers of Europe gave way to the self-confident, physically active workers, farmers, and soldiers of Palestine capable of determining their own destinies.

Histadrut's influence on the development of the Yishuv was made all the more extensive by its control of the Jewish defense force, Haganah. Formed in 1920 in response to the Arab riots of that year, Haganah was to provide a trained, centralized military arm ready to defend the Jewish community against Arab attacks. It evolved into a permanent underground reserve army with a command structure that was fully integrated into the Jewish community's political institutions. The British authorities disapproved of the organization (especially its method of procuring arms by stealing them from British bases) but made no concerted effort to disband it.

As Histadrut's membership and functions expanded, the organization was placed in the unusual position of acting as both a trade union and the largest employer within the mandate, a combination that gave its leaders substantial power in the Yishuv's decision-making councils. In 1930, two labor groups merged to form the Mapai Party, which would dominate the politics of the Yishuv and the state of Israel until 1977. Holding the view that the interests of labor and Zionism were identical, Mapai perfectly represented the socialist egalitarian ideal that powerfully shaped the outlook of the Yishuv during its formative years. Among the individuals responsible for Mapai's enduring hold on political power, David Ben-Gurion (1886– 1973) stands out. Ben-Gurion's experiences and attitudes typified his generation of Zionist leaders in Palestine. Like the vast majority of Jewish immigrants who arrived in Palestine before 1933, he was from Eastern Europe. He came to Palestine from Poland in 1906, first working on a kibbutz and then entering the inner circles of labor Zionism. A founding member of Histadrut, he served as its executive secretary for several years before his election as chairman of the Jewish Agency in 1935. He was also active in the creation of the Mapai in 1930 and became the party's leader. As both Mapai Party head and Jewish Agency chairman, Ben-Gurion was the acknowledged leader of the Yishuv and a popular choice as Israel's first prime minister in 1948.

Political and financial support from sources outside Palestine aided the Zionist cause. The most influential contacts between Zionism and British officialdom were those maintained by Chaim Weizmann. In 1920 the World Zionist Organization transferred its headquarters to London, and Weizmann became its president. His ready access to prime ministers, cabinet members, and journalists afforded him the opportunity to intervene quickly and decisively on behalf of the Zionist cause whenever British policy toward Palestine veered from the course he thought it should take. Elements of the Jewish community in the United States provided another source of outside support. The Zionist Organization of America was founded in 1917 and, under the leadership of the noted lawyer and future Supreme Court justice Louis Brandeis, became a factor in US political life. By the late 1930s, US representatives played an important role in the deliberations of the World Zionist Organization, and private contributions from the United States made up a significant portion of the funds donated to the Zionist cause. With the United States' rise to global power during World War II, American Jewry would be a vital influence in shaping the outcome of the Palestine conflict.

Divisions Within the Yishuv: Jabotinsky and Revisionist Zionism

Notwithstanding the settlers' success in establishing social and political institutions within Palestine, Zionism remained a fractious movement in which a broad spectrum of opinions found expression. One of the most heated of the interwar disputes concerned Zionism's territorial objectives and the tactics best suited to obtain them. During the mandate period, when the creation of a Jewish state was still very much in doubt, most Zionists accepted Weizmann's strategy of relying on Britain to bring about the fulfillment of Zionist objectives. However, a splinter group, eventually called the Revisionists, condemned Weizmann's approach as too hesitant and too dependent on Britain. The founder and leading spokesman of Revisionism, Russian Zionist Vladimir Jabotinsky (1880–1940), called for massive Jewish immigration into Palestine and the immediate proclamation of a Jewish commonwealth. He argued that Britain was quite capable of abandoning the Zionists and that the only way to achieve the Jewish majority required for independent statehood was by encouraging 50,000 immigrants to Palestine a year. Jabotinsky's territorial demands were even more controversial. Claiming that historic Palestine included Transjordan, he insisted that large-scale Jewish colonization take place in that territory. At the annual Zionist Congress of 1929, he addressed the delegates with these words: "What does the word Palestine mean? Palestine is a territory whose chief geographical feature is this: that the River Jordan does not delineate its frontier, but flows through its center."²

The Revisionist movement sparked enthusiastic support among Zionist youth groups in Eastern Europe, where Jabotinsky became the object of a leadership cult. In 1933, the Revisionists formed a separate movement within Zionism, and shortly thereafter, they set up their own military force in Palestine, the Irgun, which operated independently of Haganah and the Jewish Agency. Although Revisionism lost much of its force with Jabotinsky's death, two of his disciples, Menachem Begin and Yitzhak Shamir, later became Israeli prime ministers and revived their former leader's uncompromising Zionism.

As the Arab and Jewish communities in Palestine built up their political and social organizations, conflict between them deepened. Both communities were terribly insecure throughout the interwar years. The Arabs were frustrated in their attempts to gain legal recognition as Palestine's rightful inhabitants. At the same time, they rejected overtures to participate in national organizations, believing that to do so would validate the mandate and imply their acceptance of the Balfour Declaration. Likewise, Zionist leaders were convinced that the British, intent on being fair to Arabs as well as Jews, were blocking the establishment of a Jewish national home. Accordingly, they intensified their efforts to promote immigration, develop self-sufficient communal organizations, and confront what they regarded as British lack of cooperation.

IMMIGRATION AND LAND

Jewish immigration and land acquisition lay at the heart of the communal tensions in Palestine. The Zionist objective was to build up the Jewish population of the mandate through unrestricted immigration so as to have a credible claim to the existence of a national home. It was also considered necessary to acquire as much cultivable land as possible. In pursuit of these twin objectives, Zionism resembled a project of settler colonialism undertaken at the expense of the local Arab population. The Arabs of Palestine recognized that Zionist goals threatened their very existence, and they opposed them by attempting to negotiate with Britain to restrict immigration and land transfers. When that tactic failed, they turned to armed revolt. Jewish immigration to Palestine occurred in a series of waves called aliyahs (see above). The first two took place before World War I. The third, from 1919 to 1923, was composed of about 30,000 immigrants mainly from Eastern Europe. An additional 50,000 immigrants, primarily from Poland, arrived in the fourth aliyah between 1924 and 1926. The influx of immigrants then slowed considerably until 1933, when the rise of Hitler and the Nazi Party precipitated the flight of thousands of Jews from Germany and central Europe. Although many of these refugees were not Zionists, the restrictive immigration quotas imposed by such countries as the United States and Canada compelled them to seek refuge in Palestine. In the years of the fifth aliyah, from 1933 through 1936, about 170,000 Jews immigrated to Palestine, suddenly doubling the size of the Yishuv and unsettling the Arab community. The composition of the fifth aliyah differed from the others in that the German immigrants included a significant number of educated professionals and businesspeople who often brought with them substantial amounts of capital. Less interested than their pioneering predecessors in working the land, they tended to settle in the coastal cities and to engage in professional or entrepreneurial pursuits.

As Table 13.1 shows, the Jewish community in Palestine numbered approximately 382,000 by the end of 1936, a sharp rise from the 93,000 recorded in 1922. During the same period, the Arab population grew from around 700,000 to 983,000. Thus, in less than fifteen years, the Palestine population increased by more than 500,000. It is little wonder that in a region of limited agricultural potential, the ownership of arable land became a matter of contention.

The Zionist organization chiefly responsible for negotiating land purchases was the Jewish National Fund, which bought land it then regarded as belonging to the Jewish people as a whole and leased it exclusively to Jews at a nominal rate. The Jewish National Fund also provided capital for improvements and equipment, a practice that enabled impoverished immigrants to engage in agricultural pursuits immediately upon arriving in Palestine.

Zionist interests usually acquired land by purchasing it from absentee Arab owners. The first and largest such purchase under the mandate was from the Sursock family of Beirut, which sold 50,000 acres in the fertile Jezreel Valley to the Jewish National Fund in 1920. But even leading Palestinian notable families, attracted by the high prices the Zionists were willing to pay, sold cultivable land to agents of the Jewish National Fund or other Zionist purchasing organizations. By 1939, some 5 percent of the total land area of the mandate, making up approximately 10 percent of the total cultivable land, was Jewish owned.

The transfer of cultivated land from Arab to Jewish ownership devastated the Palestinian peasantry, which, in 1936, still composed two-thirds of the mandate's Arab population. The usual outcome of such a transaction was the eviction of the Arab tenant farmers and their addition to the growing ranks of the unemployed. The conditions of small proprietors also worsened during the mandate. British taxation policy, which required direct cash payments in place of the customary Ottoman payment in kind, forced peasant farmers to borrow funds at high interest rates from local moneylenders—who were frequently the large landholders. The crushing burden of indebtedness pressured many small proprietors to sell their lands, sometimes to Zionist interests but often to one of the landed Arab families. The cumulative effect of land transfers, British policy, and Arab notable attitudes was the increasing impoverishment and marginalization of the Palestinian Arab peasantry. Alienated from their own political elite, who seemed to profit from their plight; from the British, who appeared unwilling to prevent their expulsion from the land; and from the Zionists, whom they perceived to be at the root of their problems, they lashed out against all three parties.

COMMUNAL CONFLICT AND THE BRITISH RESPONSE

The two major eruptions of communal violence during the interwar years of the mandate—the Wailing Wall disturbances of 1929 and the great revolt of 1936–1939—were directly related to the dislocations caused by immigration and land transfers. Repeated British investigations into the causes of these incidents only served to highlight the unworkable nature of the mandate.

The Wailing Wall Disturbances of 1929

A dispute over Jewish rights of access to the remains of the Western, or Wailing, Wall came to serve as the focal point for the simmering communal antagonisms. Jews regarded the wall as a holy site and had gone there since the Middle Ages to pray and to lament the passing of the ancient kingdom of Israel. Muslims also had deep religious attachments to the wall and its surroundings: It formed the western abutment of the Haram al-Sharif (holy sanctuary) that contained the Dome of the Rock and al-Aqsa mosque, structures associated with Muhammad's nocturnal journey to heaven and two of the oldest, most revered Islamic shrines. At the time of the mandate, the wall was designated as waqf and was thus under Muslim jurisdiction.

Although Jews had the right to visit the wall, they were not allowed to set up such appurtenances as chairs, benches, or screens to separate men and women during prayer. The British, in keeping with their policy of maintaining the status quo in religious matters, agreed that these restrictions should remain in effect. However, Jewish activists constantly challenged the regulations, and in late 1928, the British police forcibly removed from the area a screen and the worshipers who had placed it there. The intensity of Jewish objections to this action galvanized the mufti and the Supreme Muslim Council into launching a publicity campaign about the danger Zionism posed to the holy places of Islam. A year of claims and counterclaims over the wall's status led to violent confrontations in August 1929, during which Arab mobs, provoked by Jewish demonstrations, attacked two Jewish quarters in Jerusalem and killed Jews in the towns of Hebron and Safad. By the time British forces quelled the riots, 133 Jews and 116 Arabs had lost their lives. Although the immediate cause of the riots was concern over the fate of a religious site, the real causes lay much deeper. The British decided to find out what they were.

In September 1929, London dispatched the first of what would become a nearly continuous series of official commissions to Palestine. Headed by Sir Walter Shaw, the group was to conduct an inquiry into the reasons for the previous month's violence. Its report concluded that the main source of tension within the mandate was the creation of a landless class of discontented Arabs and the widespread Arab fear that continued Jewish immigration would result in a Jewish-dominated Palestine. The Shaw Commission recommended that British obligations to the Arab community should be more precisely defined, that Jewish immigration should be brought more directly under British control, and that the practice of evicting Arab tenants following land transfers should cease.

Instead of dealing with the Shaw Commission's report on its own merits, the British decided to send another commission of inquiry to Palestine. The Hope-Simpson Commission conducted its investigation in summer 1930, and its recommendations were incorporated into a policy statement known as the Passfield White Paper (1930). The white paper stressed Britain's dual obligation as a mandatory power and stated the government's intention to set aside state lands for the settlement of landless Arab peasants. It also declared that Palestine had a limited economic absorptive capacity and proposed restrictions on Jewish immigration.

The Passfield White Paper addressed some Arab grievances, but its proposals to limit immigration were anathema to the Zionists, and they mounted a concerted effort to have the entire document withdrawn. Weizmann, joined by prominent members of the British and US Jewish communities and by British opposition politicians, put tremendous pressure on the government to rescind the policy statement. The campaign was successful. In February 1931, Prime Minister Ramsay MacDonald read to the House of Commons a personal letter he had written to Weizmann, effectively repudiating the Passfield White Paper. Known to the Arabs as the Black Letter, it confirmed their belief in the ability of Zionist pressure groups to influence the British government's decisions.

The General Strike and the Formation of the Arab Higher Committee

Following the Black Letter of 1931 and the decision to ignore most of the recommendations of the commissions of inquiry, the situation in Palestine deteriorated further. The effects of the world depression, coupled with the surging immigration of the fifth aliyah, created widespread unemployment among Arabs and Jews alike. Within the Arab community, there was growing disenchantment with the moderate leadership of Hajj Amin and the Supreme Muslim Council. The mufti's preeminent political position was challenged by a new party, the Istiqlal, composed of young Palestinian notables who advocated direct action against Britain and endorsed the development of strong ties with other Arab countries. Although Hajj Amin was able to neutralize the Istiqlal, its demands for greater militancy echoed sentiments held by growing segments of Palestine's Arab population. Born of despair and frustration, these passions found expression in the events of 1936.

The violence that swept through Palestine in spring and summer 1936 was a spontaneous popular reaction against Zionism, British imperialism, and the entrenched Arab leadership. It was set in motion on April 15 when an armed Arab band robbed a bus and killed a Jewish passenger; the following evening, Haganah retaliated by killing two Arab farmers. These incidents provoked both communities into mass demonstrations and mob attacks against each other. In an attempt to channel the popular discontent into an effective weapon against Britain and the Zionists, local Arab resistance committees declared a general strike on April 19, 1936. The strike was to continue until Britain granted the Arabs' demands for restrictions on immigration and land sales and the establishment of a democratic government.

The push of popular resistance from below forced the Arab leaders to act, and on April 25, they formed a national organization, the Arab Higher Committee, under the presidency of the mufti. Including Christians, Muslims, Nashashibis, al-Husaynis, and prominent members of Istiqlal, the Arab Higher Committee was a belated attempt to unify the factions within the Palestinian elite. Although the committee attempted to coordinate the strike, it lagged behind popular opinion and tended to respond to events rather than to create them. The strike spread rapidly during the summer and was accompanied by attacks on Jews and Jewish property and the destruction of British transport. When various attempts at mediation failed, Britain made a determined effort to crush the rebellion, and in October, after the deaths of 1,000 Arabs and 80 Jews, the strike was terminated by order of the Arab Higher Committee. The strike had revealed the depth of Palestinian Arab resentment but resolved nothing; it was thus only a precursor of greater violence to come.

The Peel Commission and the Great Revolt

Britain's pledge to send another investigative commission to Palestine was one of the reasons the Arab leadership called off the strike. Chaired by Lord Peel, this commission issued its report in July 1937, which recognized that the mandate rested on an untenable premise: A unitary state could not be created out of the contradictory obligations contained in the Balfour Declaration. According to the report, "It is manifest that the Mandate cannot be fully or honorably implemented unless by some means or other the antagonism between Arabs and Jews can be composed. But it is the Mandate which created that antagonism and keeps it alive and as long as the Mandate exists we cannot honestly hold out the expectation that Arabs or Jews will be able to set aside their national hopes or fears or sink their differences in the common service of Palestine.”³ On the basis of these findings, the Peel Commission recommended terminating the mandate and partitioning Palestine into separate Arab and Jewish states. Britain would continue to exercise mandatory authority in a corridor from Jerusalem to the Mediterranean and in other scattered areas.

This unique solution, however, satisfied neither of the two parties affected. The Arab Higher Committee opposed partition as a violation of the rights of the Arab inhabitants of Palestine. For their part, the Zionist leaders favored the principle of partition but regarded the territory allocated to the Jewish state as inadequate; this position was adopted at the World Zionist Congress of 1937 and amounted to a Zionist rejection of the Peel Commission’s report. Britain’s efforts to find a way out of the Palestine labyrinth collapsed in the face of opposition from both Arabs and Jews, and the idea of partition faded away.

Yet Palestinian Arab discontent would not vanish as easily as a commission report. Upon the announcement of the Peel Commission’s proposals in July 1937, Arab violence was renewed. As with the general strike of the previous year, it was spontaneous and locally led rather than premeditated and nationally organized. When the British district commissioner for Galilee was murdered in October, Britain responded by dissolving the Arab Higher Committee and arresting and deporting its members. The mufti escaped to Damascus, where he attempted to reconstitute the committee and to direct the uprising, but his influence over events in Palestine had waned. The Arab rebel bands, composed mainly of peasants, concentrated their attacks on railroads, bridges, and British police stations but also destroyed Jewish property and killed Jewish settlers. Although the rebels probably never numbered more than 5,000, the bulk of the rural population supported them, and by summer 1938, much of the countryside and several major towns were in their hands. Government services came to a virtual halt, and even portions of Jerusalem fell under rebel control.

In addition to its anti-British, anti-Zionist thrust, the revolt contained elements of a peasant social revolution against the established notability. In villages under their control, rebels canceled rents, denied entry to debt collectors, and coerced wealthy landlords into “donating” to the cause. Resistance committees banned the tarbush, the headgear of the Ottoman administrative elite, and insisted that men should instead wear the kaffiya, the checkered headcloth that has become a symbol of Palestinian national identity.

In an attempt to put down the uprising, Britain poured 20,000 troops into Palestine and adopted harsh measures of collective punishment on villages suspected of harboring rebels. Jewish forces also engaged in military action against the rebels as well as in retaliatory terrorist attacks against noncombatants. Despite the numerical superiority of their military forces, the British did not manage to restore order until March 1939. The revolt took a heavy toll: More than 3,000 Arabs, 2,000 Jews, and 600 British were killed; the economy of Palestine was in chaos; and the Arab leaders were in exile or under arrest.

If the revolt failed to dislodge Britain from the mandate, it nevertheless succeeded in forcing it to make one more reevaluation of its Palestine policy. This reassessment was prompted not only by the violence within Palestine but also by the impending war in Europe. In any coming conflict, Middle East oil resources and airfields would be vital to Britain. With the Arab states becoming increasingly involved in the issue of Palestine, Britain recognized the need to placate them in order to secure their future cooperation.

Against this background, the Colonial Office convened an Anglo-Arab-Jewish conference in London in February 1939. However, the conference failed to break the deadlock, and Britain was left to formulate a policy that would inevitably displease one of the parties. This policy, announced in the White Paper of 1939, shocked the Zionists. The White Paper stated, “His Majesty’s Government therefore now declare unequivocally that it is not part of their policy that Palestine should become a Jewish State.”⁴ The document declared that Jewish immigration was to be limited to 15,000 a year over the next five years, at which point it would cease altogether unless the Arab community consented to its continuation; that land transfers to Jews were to be restricted to certain specified areas; and that in ten years Palestine would be granted independence. It also proposed that an additional 25,000 Jewish refugees be allowed into the mandate. Coming at a time when Jews were fleeing Hitler's terror en masse, the White Paper was widely condemned by the international Jewish community. As Zionist leaders marshaled their supporters and prepared for a political campaign against the White Paper, Germany invaded Poland, and World War II began. The Jewish community in Palestine, despite its outrage over Britain's statement of policy, could hardly support Hitler's Germany in the conflict, but it could not acquiesce in the terms of the White Paper either, for that document meant the end of the dream of a Jewish state. As Ben-Gurion proclaimed, "We shall fight with Great Britain in this war as if there was no White Paper, and we shall fight the White Paper as if there was no war."⁵ Although the mufti, in exile in Baghdad, rejected the White Paper for not granting immediate independence, most other Palestinian Arab leaders regarded it as a victory of sorts. They now had every reason to believe they would remain a majority in Palestine.

WORLD WAR II AND THE BIRTH OF THE STATE OF ISRAEL

Responses to the Holocaust

Wartime events outside Palestine substantially influenced the future status of the troubled British mandate. The most far-reaching of these events was the Holocaust, the systematic murder of millions of European Jews and others in Hitler's death camps. As the extent of the Nazi atrocities became known, the public conscience of the West came to embrace the notion that the settlement of the surviving Jews in Palestine could atone for the horrors Western civilization had inflicted upon them. This attitude was especially pronounced in the United States. Casting aside the lack of enthusiasm that had characterized their attitude toward Zionism during the interwar years, many American Jews became ardent supporters of a Jewish state in Palestine. The most forceful public expression of this position was contained in the Biltmore Program, a set of resolutions adopted at a meeting of US Zionists in 1942 calling for open immigration to Palestine and the establishment there of a Jewish commonwealth.

In the wake of the Biltmore gathering, the United States became the center of international Zionist activity, and American and Palestinian Zionists embarked on an intensive publicity campaign to involve the US electorate and US politicians in the Palestine issue. President Harry Truman, from his arrival in the White House in 1945 through his reelection campaign of 1948, publicly endorsed the Biltmore Program, demonstrating not only humanitarian concerns but also an awareness of the growing power of the Zionist lobby within the Democratic Party. Truman's commitment to the creation of a Jewish state was significant because the United States, with its expanding industrial economy and its unprecedented military might, emerged from the war as a global superpower capable of exerting immense pressure on its allies.

Within Palestine, Britain's wartime policy was intended to keep the mandate tranquil. Seeking to prevent another outbreak of violence like the revolt of 1936–1939, the British administration restricted Arab political activity and refused to allow the exiled Arab leaders to return. As a result, the Arab community, still reeling from the effects of the British suppression of the revolt, was politically quiescent during the war.

For its part, as we have seen, the Yishuv responded to the circumstances of the war with two conflicting policies. On the one hand, it committed itself to the British war effort against Hitler; on the other hand, it attempted to subvert the White Paper of 1939 and to prepare for an armed confrontation with Britain once Germany was defeated.

In support of the Allied cause, thousands of Jewish volunteers joined the British forces, eventually forming a Jewish Brigade that fought as a unit of the British army in Italy. The modern combat experience thus gained by Jewish troops provided the Haganah with a cadre of trained veterans for fighting against Britain after 1945. In Palestine, the British administration allowed the Haganah, although technically illegal, to acquire weapons openly and to participate with British forces in preparations for Palestine's defense against an anticipated Axis invasion. When the Axis threat subsided after 1942, Haganah members retained their arms as well as their intimate knowledge of the British military network in Palestine.

Notwithstanding the abiding anti-Nazi sentiment within the Yishuv, its leaders regarded the British presence in Palestine as the primary obstacle to the fulfillment of their dream of establishing a Jewish national home. In the light of what was becoming known about the fate of European Jewry, Britain's insistence on enforcing the 1939 immigration quotas appeared to be a monstrous injustice, and the Jewish Agency mounted a concerted effort to rescue European Jews and bring them into Palestine illegally. Hiring ships that were often barely seaworthy, the Jewish Agency transported refugees out of southern European ports and landed them on the Palestine coast. When British authorities turned away ships crowded with refugees or apprehended the vessels and sent their passengers to detention camps in Cyprus, they compounded the Yishuv's determination to be rid of British control. These incidents were highly publicized and were used to buttress the Zionist claim that only a Jewish state could provide a haven for the rootless victims of Nazi brutality.

Terror and Intercommunal War

There were three phases in the conflict that brought the state of Israel into being and confirmed its existence. First was the Yishuv's campaign of sabotage against the British administration in Palestine from 1945 to 1947, second was the brief intercommunal war between the Arab and Jewish communities of Palestine in 1947 and 1948, and third was the 1948 war between Israel and the invading forces of the Arab states. Each of these phases was accompanied by a flurry of diplomatic activity that consistently failed to produce an agreement acceptable to both Arabs and Jews.

The first phase of the conflict was part of the strategy contained in the Jewish Agency's decision, made toward the end of World War II, to push for the immediate establishment of a Jewish state. Zionist leaders in Palestine, now more than ever guided by the views of Ben-Gurion, concluded that because Britain would not sponsor the gradual development of a Jewish national home by eliminating immigration quotas, the Jewish state would have to be seized by force. This was to be accomplished by making Britain's position in Palestine untenable.

Ben-Gurion did not intend to confront Britain until the war was over; however, other elements within the Jewish community were impatient. Two irregular armed units that operated independently of Jewish Agency control—though at times with its tacit approval—launched a campaign of terror against British personnel in 1944. The more important of the two was the Irgun, a fiercely nationalistic organization that served as the military arm of revisionist Zionism. The Irgun comprised a dedicated core of militant Zionists who advocated a policy of reprisals against Arab civilians and British personnel. Although the Irgun's terrorist tactics often brought discredit to the Zionist enterprise as a whole, its ruthless single-mindedness appealed to a certain segment of the Jewish community that believed that any action taken in the cause of the creation of a Jewish state was justified. In 1943, the Irgun came under the command of Menachem Begin, a recent immigrant from Poland who led the organization until its dissolution in 1948 and who then carried his spirit of uncompromising militancy into Israeli politics. The other dissident military unit, Lehi (often called the Stern Gang after its founder, Abraham Stern), was much smaller and less effective as a combat force but performed isolated acts of terror, such as the 1944 assassination of the British minister of state for the Middle East, Lord Moyne.

The Jewish Agency joined the conflict in 1945 when units of the Haganah undertook a series of well-coordinated acts of sabotage against British communications in Palestine. Mainstream Palestinian Zionism had gone to war against Britain. Over the next two years, the combined pressure of Haganah sabotage, Irgun terror (such as the blowing up in 1946 of a wing of Jerusalem's King David Hotel, headquarters to both the civil and the military administrations of Palestine), and US opinion placed Britain in an impossible position. In February 1947, Foreign Secretary Ernest Bevin, recognizing that Britain had lost control of the situation in Palestine, referred the matter to the United Nations.

Bevin's request for United Nations to formulate a solution to the Palestine mandate was followed by months of feverish diplomatic activity at the United Nations in New York and the White House in Washington. The General Assembly created a United Nations Special Committee on Palestine (UNSCOP) and charged it with investigating conditions in Palestine and submitting recommendations by September 1, 1947. Composed of representatives from eleven nations, UNSCOP arrived in Jerusalem in June and spent five weeks in Palestine. The committee found that Jews were still a considerable minority in Palestine, constituting only a third of the population and owning roughly 6 percent of the total land. However, the committee also felt a sense of urgency with regard to both the deteriorating conditions in Palestine and the plight of Jewish refugees from Europe. In its report to the General Assembly, UNSCOP unanimously recommended the termination of the British mandate and the granting of independence to Palestine. But the committee was divided, by a vote of eight to three, on what kind of state independent Palestine should be. The minority report called for a federal state. The majority report recommended the partition of the mandate into two states, one Arab and one Jewish, with Jerusalem designated as an internationalized district. Although far from perfect, the provisions of the majority report offered the possibility of independent Arab and Jewish states within Palestine (see Map 13.2). Zionist leaders endorsed the report; Arab leaders rejected it.

President Truman, fully supportive of the creation of a Jewish state, was determined to achieve the passage of the majority report. Because the proposal required a two-thirds majority vote in the General Assembly and because Washington assumed that the Soviet Union and its allies would oppose it, the vote was expected to be close. Truman—in defiance of the advice of his own State and Defense departments, whose heads recognized the usefulness of maintaining cordial relations with the newly independent Arab states—launched an extensive lobbying effort on behalf of the majority report, and pro-Zionist members of Congress pressured UN delegates with threats of the withdrawal of US economic assistance from their countries if they did not vote for the UNSCOP proposal. The roll call on November 29, 1947, yielded thirty-three votes (including the USSR's) in favor, thirteen against, and ten abstentions: The General Assembly approved the partition of Palestine into separate Arab and Jewish states and accorded international status to Jerusalem. As Charles Smith wrote, “Whatever the nature of the Zionist accomplishment in Palestine, the victory at the United Nations was essentially won in the United States.”⁶ That victory and the policies that flowed from it have colored US-Arab relations ever since.

Throughout the negotiations, the Palestinian Arab community was curiously marginal to the discussions. Ever since the British had dismantled the Arab Higher Committee and the Supreme Muslim Council in 1936, the Palestinian Arabs had lacked effective leadership. Absent unified leadership from within Palestine, the responsibility for presenting the Palestinian Arab case came to rest with the Arab League and its member states. However, the postwar Arab regimes, especially in such key states as Egypt, Syria, and Iraq, faced mounting domestic unrest. The ruling elite of these regimes, anxious to shore up domestic support, adopted a hard-line stance on Palestine as a means to demonstrate their anti-imperialism and to assert their independence in foreign policy. On the Palestinians' behalf, they rejected all attempts at compromise, including the UN partition plan, assuring the Arabs of Palestine that they stood ready to defend them militarily. It was a self-deluding posture.

Britain's refusal to assist in the implementation of the UN partition plan intensified the disorder within Palestine. When the UNSCOP report was presented to the UN, Britain did not wait for the General Assembly's vote and immediately announced in September 1947 that the Palestine mandate would be terminated on May 15, 1948. In the months between the announcement and the final British withdrawal, Palestine was plunged into chaos. This was the period of intercommunal war during which the Jewish forces sought to secure the territory allotted to the Jewish state in the UN resolution. Because an Arab majority still inhabited most of that territory, there was quite naturally Arab resistance. However, the scattered Arab bands were no match for the disciplined Haganah forces, and by spring 1948, the major centers of Arab population that fell within the proposed Jewish state were in Jewish control and the Arab inhabitants, about 400,000 Palestinians, had fled. During this intercommunal war, the Irgun perpetrated one of its most notorious acts, the massacre of 120 civilian inhabitants of the village of Dayr Yassin near Jerusalem. News of the slaughter spread among the Arab population and contributed to the panic that made so many flee their homes. An Arab unit retaliated for Dayr Yassin by ambushing a Jewish medical relief convoy on the outskirts of Jerusalem and killing over 70 passengers. Thus, atrocity built upon atrocity in the territory that was still Britain's responsibility.

Throughout the intercommunal war, the British administration made little effort to enforce order, concentrating instead on preparations for its withdrawal. On May 14, 1948, in the midst of the turmoil, the last British high commissioner, General Alan Cunningham, quietly departed from Haifa. As one eyewitness recalled the moment, “The Union Jack was lowered and with the speed of an execution and the silence of a ship that passes in the night British rule in Palestine came to an end.”⁷ There had been no formal transfer of powers from the mandate authority to a new local government for the simple reason that there was no government of Palestine. Britain had failed to create political institutions in its mandate, instead leaving the Arab and Jewish communities to vie for supremacy. In this struggle, the Jewish community emerged victorious; a few hours after High Commissioner Cunningham’s departure, Ben-Gurion proclaimed the independence of the state of Israel. The United States and the Soviet Union immediately recognized the new state.

THE FIRST ARAB-ISRAELI WAR

On May 15, 1948, units from the armies of Egypt, Syria, Lebanon, Transjordan, and Iraq invaded Israel. Thus began a regional war, interspersed with several truces, that lasted until December 1948 and resulted in the defeat of the Arab forces, the enlargement of Israeli territory, and the collapse of the UN proposal for a Palestinian Arab state.

Ostensibly operating under the unified authority of the Arab League, each of the Arab states participating in the invasion in fact placed its own interests first. Thus, inter-Arab political rivalries hampered from the outset the invasion of Israel, and this in turn led to a lack of coordination on the battlefield. In addition, the Arab forces, with the exception of King Abdallah's Arab Legion, were not only poorly prepared, poorly equipped, and poorly led; they were also outnumbered. The legend of a defenseless, newborn Israel facing the onslaught of hordes of Arab soldiers does not correspond to reality. During the first round of fighting, from May 15 to June 11, 1948, the combined Arab armies numbered around 21,500, whereas the Haganah and its affiliated units fielded a force of some 30,000. Numbers, of course, do not tell the whole story. The Israeli forces, under the overall strategic command of Ben-Gurion, were motivated by the belief that they were engaged in a life-and-death struggle for the very existence of a Jewish state. They performed exceptionally well, exhibiting the daring and combat improvisation that were to characterize the Israeli military in its subsequent wars. By the time of the first UN armistice in June, the Arab attacks had been repulsed on all fronts except Jerusalem, where the Arab Legion took East Jerusalem and Israeli forces held the new, western portion of the city. Although both sides used the truce to improve their armaments, the Israelis entered the next round of combat (July 9–18) with markedly superior forces. The size of the Haganah was doubled and its firepower substantially increased by the procurement of supplies of small arms, heavy equipment, and even a few aircraft from Europe. When the second armistice took effect in July, the Israeli victory was assured.

Over the next twelve months, each of the belligerent Arab states concluded an armistice agreement with Israel. These agreements were not peace treaties, and they did not constitute recognition of Israel on the part of the Arab signatories; they simply stabilized the cease-fire borders without accepting them as final. Palestine had effectively been partitioned among Israel, Egypt (which remained in occupation of the Gaza Strip), and Transjordan (which had taken the old city of Jerusalem and the territory west of the Jordan River; see Map 13.3).

Not only was there no Palestinian Arab state, but the vast majority of the Arab population in the territory that became Israel—over 700,000 people—were now refugees. The Arab flight from Palestine began during the intercommunal war and was at first the normal reaction of a civilian population to nearby fighting—a temporary evacuation from the zone of combat with plans to return once hostilities ceased. However, during spring and early summer 1948, the flight of the Palestinian Arabs was transformed into a permanent mass exodus, as villagers abandoned their ancestral soil and city dwellers left behind their homes and businesses. Once the Arab flight had started, the Haganah encouraged it. To secure the interior of the Israeli state and protect Jewish settlements lying outside its UN-decreed borders, the Haganah, in April 1948, authorized a campaign against potentially hostile Arab villages. Known as Plan D, the campaign “provided for the conquest and permanent occupation, or leveling, of Arab villages and towns.”⁸ The Haganah field officers interpreted Plan D as giving them authority to undertake the systematic expulsion of the Palestinian Arabs living within the area allocated to the Jewish state as well as those whose villages lay just inside the territory awarded to the Arab state. The implementation of Plan D heightened fears among the Arab population and contributed to the flight that soon took on an irreversible momentum. As hundreds of thousands of Arab civilians headed for the frontiers, the Israeli command took advantage of the opportunity that was presented to ensure a contiguous and homogeneous Jewish state with a solid Jewish majority. Throughout the remainder of 1948 and into 1949, there were incidents of forced expulsion of Arabs, and by the time the last armistice agreement was concluded in 1949, only 160,000 Arabs remained within the borders of Israel.

Most of those who had fled or been deported were destitute and crowded into refugee camps in various Arab states. The forceful creation of the state of Israel replaced the European Jewish refugee problem with a Middle Eastern refugee problem that has caused great personal suffering and regional political turmoil ever since (see Chapter 17).

In addition to creating the tragedy of displaced Palestinians, the decisive Israeli military victory—referred to as the War of Independence in Israel—over the invading Arab forces discredited the regimes that had ordered such unprepared units into combat. The Arab defeat took on civilizational overtones, bringing about a critical self-examination of the social and political bases of Arab life. One of the most influential Arab commentaries on the subject, Constantine Zurayq's The Meaning of the Disaster, received such widespread circulation that it made the term disaster (in Arabic, "al-Nakba") synonymous with the Arab defeat of 1948. That defeat and its sweeping condemnation among Arabs themselves transformed the original struggle between the Arab and Jewish inhabitants of Palestine into the tragic Arab-Israeli conflict.

CONCLUSION

From the perspective of relations between states, the 1940s brought profound change in the Middle East. The creation of Israel, the flight and homelessness of several hundred thousand Palestinians, the formation of the Arab League, the achievement of independence by the core Arab states, and the decline of Britain and France and the emergence of the United States and the Soviet Union as world powers represented significant new developments for the region. Yet in domestic politics, remarkably little changed. With the exception of the shah of Iran, the ruling monarchs of 1949 had been on their thrones in the 1930s, and the men who held office as prime ministers and presidents in 1949 had served in similar capacities in the 1930s.

In several countries, especially the populous Arab states, the ruling elite no longer represented the aspirations of their people. They were seen to perpetuate an old order of corruption and privilege and to owe their political power to their willingness to cooperate with the forces of imperialism. They were also regarded as responsible for creating the circumstances that led to the "disaster" of 1948. They managed to retain their positions during and immediately after World War II, but in the emerging era of national independence, new forces of change would sweep aside the ruling elite and the social and political order that supported them.

PART FOUR

THE INDEPENDENT MIDDLE EAST FROM THE END OF WORLD WAR II TO THE 1970s

The end of World War II brought to the central Arab states the sovereignty they had demanded since their creation in 1920. However, the withdrawal of European troops and administrators did not, as the entire Middle East region quickly discovered, mean the end of dependence on outside powers. The emergence of the cold war competition for global supremacy between the Soviet Union and the United States embroiled many of the Middle East states in a regional cold war—and sometimes a hot one—as allies of one or the other superpowers. Economic assistance and military weapons became the new commodities of alliance building. Countries such as Turkey, Iran, Jordan, and Israel that sided fully with the United States and its European allies against the Soviet Union received generous amounts of US aid and were encouraged to purchase large quantities of Western weapons. Countries that preferred to keep a certain distance between themselves and their former imperial rulers found themselves shut off from Western aid and forced to turn to the Soviet Union for military and economic assistance. The cold war was an essential and basic factor in diplomatic relations and external assistance for virtually all the region's states during the period covered in this section of the book. The United States, in particular, tended to view the Middle East solely through the lens of its rivalry with the Soviet Union for global supremacy, and it neglected to develop policies that might have improved its relations with the core Arab states.

The political leadership of the core Arab countries—Egypt, Syria, and Iraq—changed dramatically during the 1950s. Upper-class civilian politicians educated in European-style institutions were replaced by young military officers from the lower urban or rural strata of society. Motivated by sentiments of nationalism and eager to achieve social justice, economic development, and military superiority over Israel, the officer-politicians adopted ambitious reform programs and initiated weapons purchases that left them indebted to the Soviet Union. The very nature of their objectives led them to expand the role of the state to an unprecedented degree and to introduce planned economies and new networks of social control. Though they endorsed the imperative of Arab unity more emphatically than their predecessors, they also built up the state's machinery to such an extent that unity was increasingly unlikely. They denounced the corruption of the bourgeois governments they overthrew, but they set up parasitic state bureaucracies that sapped both revenue and initiative. While they embraced the rhetoric of popular democracy, they established authoritarian single-party regimes with sham parliaments and meaningless elections. And though they vastly expanded educational opportunities, they introduced instruments of censorship to limit free expression. The rise of the young military officers to power was greeted with initial popular enthusiasm. But like their predecessors of the interwar era, they were unable to satisfy popular aspirations, and so movements rose in protest against their prolonged rule.

The most obvious manifestation of the failure of the reformist Arab regimes to achieve their stated objectives was Israel's resounding military victory over the combined forces of Egypt, Syria, and Jordan in the June War of 1967. This war was a seminal event in modern Middle Eastern history and ushered in a tumultuous, decades-long period of readjustment. Israel's continued occupation of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip generated intense debate within Israeli society and contributed to the rising influence of religious parties as a political force. The Israeli occupation also contributed to the rise of Palestinian nationalism and to the formation of Palestinian organizations committed to the establishment of an independent Palestinian state. The activities of these organizations added a significant new dimension to regional politics and imparted to the Palestinians greater influence than they had previously exercised.

CHAPTER 14

DEMOCRACY AND AUTHORITARIANISM

Turkey and Iran

Turkey and Iran embarked on different courses of political development in the three decades following World War II. In Turkey, the authoritarian single-party rule of the Republican People's Party (RPP) gave way to a multiparty system in which elections were openly contested and voters eagerly participated. Although Turkish democracy had moments of crisis during this period, they were resolved in favor of a continued commitment to political pluralism and freedom of expression. In Iran, in contrast, Muhammad Reza Shah, after narrowly surviving an oil nationalization crisis in the early 1950s, consolidated an authoritarian monarchy that severely restricted political activity. The shah was not without reformist ambitions, but he would tolerate no challenges to his power; the government he established thus rested on a narrow base of royal authority supported by the army and the secret police.

THE ROLE OF THE UNITED STATES IN THE POSTWAR YEARS

Although the cold war struggle between the United States and the Soviet Union affected the entire Middle East, the first states of the region to be drawn into the superpower rivalry were Turkey and Iran, the Soviet Union's immediate neighbors. The United States, as part of its policy of containing the Soviet Union, provided economic and military assistance to the two states. In doing so, the United States inserted itself as an influential force in the domestic and foreign policy considerations of Turkey and Iran. Therefore, before examining domestic developments in the two countries, we begin with an overview of the concerns that led the United States to become so deeply involved in their affairs.

In 1945, Turkey and Iran were confronted with threats to their sovereignty by the Soviet Union. Early in the year, Moscow put forward claims to Turkish territory in eastern Anatolia and demanded a greater share in governing and policing the Turkish Straits. Turkish president Inönü's government, encouraged by Britain and the United States, rejected the Soviet demands and asserted its sovereignty. The United States, however, took the incident as an example of Soviet expansionism and was awakened to Turkey's strategic importance and to the desirability of including the country within the emerging US alliance against communism. For its part, the government in Ankara, Turkey's capital, recognized that it could not resist Soviet designs by itself and agreed to accept US financial and military assistance and to allow the United States to establish military bases on Turkish territory. This development marked the beginning of the durable but sometimes troubled postwar alliance between the two nations.

Iran's crisis with the Soviet Union was occasioned by Soviet behavior in the Iranian province of Azerbaijan. Soviet troops remained in the region after the war, a violation of the treaty signed in 1941. In November 1945, the provincial government of Azerbaijan, with Moscow's support, declared its autonomy. A month later, Kurdish patriots followed suit and proclaimed the autonomous Kurdish Republic of Mahabad in southwestern Azerbaijan. The Iranian government, with strong backing from the United States, lodged a complaint with the UN Security Council, and in spring 1946, the Soviet Union agreed to withdraw its forces from Iranian territory. Immediately after the Soviet evacuation, the shah sent Iranian troops into Azerbaijan to crush the autonomy movements' local supporters.

These two incidents, coupled with Soviet activities in Eastern Europe, contributed to the emergence of the cold war perspective within US foreign policy circles: The Soviet Union was seen as an aggressively expansionist power devoted to the single-minded mission of spreading communism throughout the world. Such an uncomplicated interpretation of Soviet motives led to an equally uncomplicated response: The United States, in order to protect its new global interests, had to commit its resources and those of its allies to the containment of the Soviet Union.

In the eastern Mediterranean region, the cold war view was expressed through the Truman Doctrine of 1947. Formulated in reaction to the Soviet pressures on Turkey as well as to the outbreak of a Communist insurgency in Greece, the Truman Doctrine was an early formulation of the domino theory. It embodied the belief that unless the United States intervened, the Soviet Union was likely to gain control of Greece and Turkey, and once this occurred, the other states of the Middle East would quickly fall under Communist influence. The Truman Doctrine aimed to forestall this eventuality by committing Washington to provide military assistance and economic aid to Greece and Turkey. Consequently, between 1947 and 1960, US aid to Turkey totaled around $3 billion, enabling the Turks to maintain an armed force of 500,000 men as a deterrent to Soviet designs. The sheer scale of the foreign aid may also have led the Turkish government to adopt irresponsible economic policies in the 1950s.

The US policy of containment included plans to construct a network of interlocking alliances among the Middle Eastern states. Thus, in 1952, Turkey and Greece became full members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO); in 1954, Turkey and Pakistan signed a mutual cooperation treaty; and in 1955, the Baghdad Pact was created by an alliance between Turkey and Iraq to which Britain, Pakistan, and Iran soon became parties. In erecting this shield of alliances against Soviet expansionism, the United States took over Britain's role as the primary Western power in the Middle East. Although the countries of the region appreciated US economic aid, the United States' interference in domestic political life and the presence of US military bases became a cause for resentment in some quarters. The United States had replaced Britain not only as a power but also as a target for criticism by Middle Eastern nationalists.

TURKEY: THE TRANSITION TO A MULTIPARTY SYSTEM

The war's end brought to the surface pressures for economic and political change in Turkey. Since assuming office in 1938, President Inönü had followed the lines of economic development laid down by Atatürk. This meant adherence to the principle of etatism, by which the government took a major role in sponsoring industrial development. However, by the late 1940s, the Turkish business sector wanted more freedom for private entrepreneurial activity, and the Turkish peasantry, still a majority of the population, disapproved of the government's concentration on industrial development at the expense of agriculture. In addition, intellectuals and politicians alike shared a growing sentiment against a single party's monopolization of political power. Responding to these currents, Inönü permitted greater freedom for the expression of political dissent. Four members of the national assembly took advantage of this opportunity and defected from the RPP in 1946 to form a new organization, the Democratic Party. Their activities were to bring momentous political change to Turkey.

The new party received the first test of its popularity in the 1946 elections. Although the Democrats won only 65 out of 465 seats in the national assembly, the very presence of an opposition party represented an important development in Turkish political life. During the next four years, the Democrats frequently challenged government policy in the assembly and engaged in heated debate with RPP representatives. The Democrats also concentrated on building an effective grassroots political organization with branches throughout Turkey. Although the Democrats' program did not differ significantly from that of the RPP, they attracted support by skillfully exploiting the growing popular disaffection, especially marked in the countryside, with state interference in people's lives. Such regulation was the very essence of Kemalism—the establishment of state authority and the intervention of the state to enforce the social and legal changes instituted by the governments of Atatürk and Inönü.

The Democratic Party pledged to reduce the interventionist practices of the Kemalist state, portraying itself as the representative of the common Turk on the one hand and the private-sector business community on the other. The elections of 1950 demonstrated the resonance of this message for voters. In what is often referred to as a revolution in modern Turkish politics, the Democrats won 408 seats in the national assembly, the Republicans only 69. The Turkish people had expressed their desire for change, and after twenty-seven years of Republican rule, the party of Atatürk was swept out of office. İnönü, whose statesmanship during this period of transition has been widely acclaimed, handed the reins of government over to the Democrats in an orderly manner and joined the national assembly as the opposition leader. Only four years after the founding of an opposition party, Turkey had peacefully transitioned to a multiparty democracy.

The Democrats in Power, 1950–1960

The Democratic majority in the assembly turned to the party's founders for the highest national offices, electing Celal Bayar president and Adnan Menderes prime minister. These two individuals dominated Turkish politics during the Democrats' decade in power. Bayar (1882–1986) was a banker with a long record of government service; Menderes (1899–1961) came from a family of large landholders and held a degree from the Ankara College of Law. The two men's lack of a military background has led some scholars to view the rise of the Democratic Party as synonymous with a change in the composition of the Turkish political elite after 1950. Instead of being dominated by government officials and military officers turned politicians, the national assembly came to include a high proportion of professionals and businesspeople. This development marked a break with the late Ottoman and early Republican trend, by which a career in the military or the bureaucracy served as a path to political power.

Did the Turkish people's support of the Democrats mean that they desired to overturn the Atatürk-Inönü legacy of secularism? An indication of the policy changes expected of the new government was given upon the public announcement of the Democratic victory: The forbidden call to prayer in Arabic reverberated from mosques in many regions of the country. The Menderes government knew full well what its mandate was in this regard, and one of its first acts was to legalize the call to prayer in Arabic. Other antisecularization measures briskly followed. Religious instruction was offered to all Muslim students in the primary school system unless their parents specifically requested otherwise, the number of schools for training Muslim prayer leaders increased, and considerable government expenditures went to the repair of existing mosques and to the construction of some 5,000 new ones. This more favorable political climate also saw an expansion in publications dealing with religious subjects as well as a renewed public observance of such Islamic rituals as the Ramadan fast and the pilgrimage to Mecca.

Throughout the 1950s, the public celebration of religious ritual and the official authorization of modest institutional changes in the role of Islam marked a change from previous policy. However, this trend was more representative of a return to a balanced expression of popular religious desires than it was a determined reaction against the policies of Kemalism. People were free to practice what had been restricted for nearly thirty years. Insofar as this freedom contributed to the government's popularity, the Democrats allowed it to continue. Yet if Menderes exploited religious issues for political purposes, he was not in favor of overturning the principle of secularism, only in modifying it.

The economy was the other principal issue on which the Democrats differed from the Republicans. Menderes was committed to reducing the role of the state and allowing more scope for private enterprise and the forces of the marketplace. At the same time, however, his government had also pledged to undertake agricultural reforms and to improve the rural standard of living. These two parts of the Democrats' economic policy were contradictory. Although there is no question that the Menderes government abandoned any semblance of economic planning, it is also true that the state retained a central role in the economy by its fiscal intervention in projects designed to develop Turkey's agricultural sector. Menderes was well aware that the conservative peasantry's votes had contributed significantly to his electoral victory, and he was careful to nurture this support. His government imported vast quantities of expensive agricultural machinery, especially tractors; built dams and irrigation canals; and constructed a national network of highways that not only helped communication but also opened previously remote regions to commercial agriculture. During the 1950s, Turkish peasants experienced a decided improvement in their quality of life; under the policies of the Menderes government, agricultural production increased by 75 percent, and cultivators of wheat, cotton, and tobacco gained new access to national and international markets. However, in the mid-1950s, the economy began to sour, and a series of droughts devastated the agricultural sector and halted the rural prosperity associated with the Democratic Party. In addition, Menderes's penchant for spending without planning—for importing consumer products and expensive machinery without funds to pay for them—ran up annual budget deficits that resulted in a mounting national debt.

From the beginning of their tenure, the Democrats had been sensitive to public criticism, and once their economic policies came under fire, they introduced a series of repressive measures that allowed the government to censor the press, imprison journalists, and shut down offending newspapers. But such practices could backfire. By removing the outlets for peaceful criticism, the government created a situation in which violent protest became the only means of expressing opposition. Violence consequently occurred with increasing frequency in Turkey's cities during spring 1960, and as it edged into Turkish political life, Menderes called upon the army to maintain law and order. He also used the armed forces for less orderly purposes, assigning them the task of disrupting Republican Party campaign rallies. This strategy proved to be a mistake. In April 1960, troops blocked the train carrying İnönü to the city of Kayseri, where he was scheduled to deliver a speech. When İnönü disembarked to see what the trouble was, the troops respectfully parted before him; he then reboarded, and his train entered Kayseri between rows of officers and men standing at the salute in tribute to the former companion of Atatürk and hero of the war of independence. The incident at Kayseri should have made clear to Menderes that the army would not be turned into a tool of political repression against Atatürk's legacy. Nor, as it happened, would the army allow the government to stray far from that legacy. A few weeks after the Kayseri incident, with the economy in decline and the government drifting toward authoritarianism, the military intervened and brought an abrupt end to the first Turkish republic.

The Coup d'État of 1960

Early on May 27, 1960, the Turkish armed forces, under the command of General Cemal Gürsel, seized control of Istanbul and Ankara and arrested leading government officials, including President Bayar and Prime Minister

Menderes. Like countless other military juntas throughout the world, the Turkish officers disavowed any intention of remaining in power. Unlike most of their counterparts in newly independent states, however, they kept their promise and returned the reins of government to the civilian politicians in October 1961. This was not a coup d'état engineered by junior officers ambitious to prolong military rule; rather, the intervention of 1960 was led by a general and was carried out to preserve the principles of Kemalism from which the Menderes government had strayed, in the opinion of the military. From the Ottoman reforms of the nineteenth century to Atatürk's role in the foundation of the republic, the military had been in the forefront of European-style change. Men with military backgrounds had not only won the war of independence; they had laid the foundations for the new Turkey. Although Atatürk had separated the military from politics, the armed forces continued to think of themselves as the guardians of the secular, reformist, and democratic goals proclaimed by Atatürk and followed by his successor, Inönü.

Once the military assumed power, it faced the complex problems of governing and of ensuring that its intervention would produce the outcome it desired. As the instrument of governmental decision making, a National Unity Council made up of thirty-eight officers was formed. General Gürsel became chairman of the council as well as president and prime minister. Within hours of the coup, the council had a group of Istanbul University law professors flown to Ankara to draft a new constitution. This act appeared to confirm that the military intervention was temporary and that the National Unity Council leaders were committed to preserving Atatürk's principle of separating the military from politics.

The revised constitution was approved in July 1961. It differed from its predecessor in that it replaced the single-house national assembly with a bicameral legislature consisting of a senate and an assembly. It also included clauses protecting the rights of individuals and asserting the principle of secularism. With the constitution in place, the National Unity Council prepared to return the country to civilian rule.

Before elections were held, the military needed to resolve the dilemma of how to deal with the imprisoned members of the Democratic Party. To justify their intervention in the political process, the army officers had to demonstrate to the Turkish people that the Democratic leaders were guilty of more onerous crimes than simple misgovernment. Nearly 600 members of the deposed regime were charged with offenses involving political and financial corruption and subversion of the constitution. The trials lasted nearly a year and resulted in the conviction and imprisonment of some 450 individuals for terms ranging from one year to life. Menderes and two of his cabinet ministers were sentenced to death and were hanged in September 1961. Followers of the still-popular Menderes saw his execution as a political act, not as an act of justice, and it tarnished the otherwise credible reputation the military earned during its eighteen months in power.

The Second Republic from 1961 to 1983: Social Change, Political Instability, and Military Intervention

An overview of governmental changes in the two decades after 1961 reveals the instability of Turkish political life during this period. After four years of RPP coalition governments, the new Justice Party won the elections of 1965, but it could not effectively deal with the rising tide of violence and social unrest within the country, and the military removed it from office in 1971. Two years later, the military returned Turkey to civilian rule, but by 1980, the country again faced domestic turmoil, and again the military intervened to restore order and uphold Kemalist principles.

These developments symptomized a complex process of social, economic, and demographic change. The population nearly doubled in twenty-five years, leaping from 21 million in 1950 to slightly more than 40 million in 1975. Turkey, like other Middle Eastern states, rapidly urbanized after World War II. In 1950, 8.4 percent of the Turkish population lived in cities of 100,000 and over; in 1975, the figure was 23 percent. The population of Istanbul grew from 1 million in 1950 to more than 5 million by the mid-1980s. During the same period, Ankara's population swelled from 290,000 to 2.2 million. The breakneck pace of urbanization stemmed from the migration of villagers to cities in search of better economic opportunities. They did not always find them, and shantytowns inhabited by unemployed or underemployed migrants became a prominent feature of Turkey's urban landscape.

In response to limited opportunities at home, Turks sought employment abroad. Beginning in the 1960s, Turkish workers migrated to Western Europe en masse, and by the late 1980s, some 1.8 million Turks resided in West Germany alone. They were called “guest workers” because the host European countries did not intend to grant them permanent residency, expecting them instead to return to Turkey. However, large numbers of Turkish workers stayed in Europe for prolonged periods, raised families there, and, against mounting resistance, sought to become citizens of the states in which they were employed. The issue of the status of the Turks in Europe became an explosive one, especially in Germany, and it remains a factor in Turkey’s relations with European governments.

It is testimony to the Turkish educational system that during the quarter century of rapid population growth after 1950, the literacy rate continued to rise. By 1975, nearly 75 percent of Turkish men and 48 percent of women were literate, up from 47 percent and 20 percent in 1950. The disparity between male and female literacy rates suggests that the full legal emancipation of women Atatürk had decreed was not translated into practical reality. Nevertheless, in some fields, Turkish women played a greater role than their counterparts in other Middle Eastern countries. For example, every national assembly from 1935 (when women were first eligible for election) to 1975 contained female representatives. It is also noteworthy that by 1975, girls made up 46 percent of the students in primary schools, though only 20 percent of university students were women. Naturally, statistics of this kind do not reveal attitudes and opportunities, nor do they explain that notions about what constituted proper social behavior for women varied among regions, generations, and social classes. Although Turkish society as a whole remained conservative on the matter of women’s social roles, women’s increasing participation in education and public life constituted a significant aspect of the country’s social and economic transformation.

The post-1950 social and economic transformation severely strained Turkey’s political structure, which had been designed to function as a two-party system. The two mainstream parties were unable to accommodate the growing diversity of interests that Turkey’s transition from a predominantly agricultural to a mixed economy had spawned. Groups that had prospered under the policies of one particular government—industrialists and peasants under Menderes, for example—did not wish to lose their favored status when new governments came to power. They therefore formed political parties to represent their particular interests in the national assembly. At the same time, other groups that believed their needs were being ignored—industrial workers and university students, Marxists and Muslim revivalists—formed their own organizations and parties through which they hoped to secure a share of political power. In the 1960s and 1970s, this process of institutionalizing interest groups led to a proliferation of political parties; by 1969, the number of parties represented in the national assembly had grown to eight. Although most Turks continued to support one of the two mainstream parties, the smaller organizations attracted enough voters to prevent either Justice or the Republicans from gaining an absolute majority. The resulting legislative logjam prompted dissatisfied groups to reject the formal channels of politics and take their demands to the street.

The circumstances that led to the military overthrow of Prime Minister Süleyman Demirel's Justice Party government in 1971 illustrate the challenges that the proliferation of political parties posed to Turkish democracy. During Demirel's term in office, factions within his party defected to form splinter groups of their own, gradually reducing his parliamentary majority and bringing the legislative process to a halt. To add to the administration's difficulties, an economic recession in the late 1960s sparked a wave of social unrest marked by street demonstrations, labor strikes, and political assassinations. The Justice Party government, like the Democratic Party regime a decade earlier, was unable to contain the violence. Therefore, in March 1971, the Turkish High Command sent an ultimatum to the government, charging it with driving the country into political anarchy and economic chaos and demanding the resignation of Prime Minister Demirel. This military intervention became known as the coup by memorandum because, in contrast to the 1960 coup, the armed forces remained behind the scenes and did not seize power.

Nevertheless, the civilian politicians who governed Turkey from 1971 to 1973 did so under instructions from the military. The High Command was motivated by an unrealistic belief that an increasingly complex society could somehow be purged of its class divisions, its economic disparities, and its ideological disagreements by the simple expedient of removing discontented activists. Operating under martial law, the government arrested and imprisoned hundreds of people, especially those identified with the radical Left. Strikes were banned in certain provinces, and several newspapers were closed. Yet for all the heavy-handed tactics, few essential changes had been introduced when the army withdrew from its supervisory role in 1973. Violence had been suppressed, but the social, economic, and political tensions at the root of the violence had not diminished.

The 1973 elections brought the Republican Party back to power. But because the two-year military interlude had not resolved Turkey's political crisis, the Republicans were again forced to form a coalition government, this time with the National Salvation Party, a conservative, religiously oriented party that advocated the veiling of women and the return of the Arabic script. Prime Minister Bulent Ecevit, the leader of the secularizing party of Atatürk, found himself allied with an avowedly religious party in order to cling to power. The arrangement has been aptly described as "a marriage of inconvenience."¹

It is not surprising that the marriage did not last. In 1975, Turkey descended into the same kind of political turmoil and urban violence that had plagued it in the 1960s. Coalition governments rose and fell, and the minority parties exercised an influence out of all proportion to their electoral support. One analysis of the causes of the social and political turmoil of the 1970s suggests that both of the mainstream parties, Republican and Justice, granted excessive favors to the minority parties in order to attract them as coalition partners. Such favors included the appointment of a number of minority party leaders to cabinet positions. Once the small parties acquired power, they tried to ensure that they kept it by staffing their ministries with supporters. In this manner, the bureaucracy and the law enforcement agencies became politicized, as patronage appointees replaced professional civil servants and police. The entrenchment of elements of the extreme Right and Left in the institutions of state polarized the civil service and reduced the ability of the police to deal with the growing violence.

Two additional elements of discord compounded the breakdown of civil order. The first was increased activity on the part of Kurdish separatists. The second was the rise of Islamic revivalism led by the National Salvation Party. In September 1980, the party held a massive national rally, during which the crowds demanded the return of the shari‘ah and refused to sing the Turkish national anthem. Both developments threatened the secular and nationalist principles of Kemalism, principles that the officer corps regarded as the cornerstones of the modern Turkish state. On September 12, 1980, the Turkish High Command, for the third time in twenty years, stepped into the political arena.

The leading civilian politicians were placed under house arrest, and a military-dominated National Security Council took charge of the administrative and legislative functions of government. As in the two previous interventions, the generals did not intend to remain in power, but they did intend to restore order. The new regime proclaimed martial law, dissolved militant trade unions, and arrested and tried thousands of suspected terrorists and political agitators. The leader of the National Salvation Party was charged with violating the secular principles of the constitution and sentenced to a four-year prison term. To weed out the politicized elements within the bureaucracy and restore its professionalism, the military also purged the civil service and decreed a uniform grooming code intended to eliminate any outward symbols of political loyalty: The code banned “leftist moustaches, rightist sideburns, and ambiguous beards.”²

The intervention of 1971 had ended the political turmoil but had not addressed its causes; the generals of 1980 were determined to restructure the political system. They achieved this goal largely through the drafting of a new constitution that strengthened the president’s powers by giving him the authority to appoint the prime minister and to dissolve the national assembly. The constitution also provided for tighter government control of universities, trade unions, and the press. To reduce small-party influence, a new electoral law denied parliamentary representation to any party that did not receive 10 percent of the total vote. The new constitution was approved in a national referendum in 1982. The National Security Council then named General Evren president for a seven-year term and, hopeful that the reconstructed system contained enough safeguards to prevent a recurrence of disorder, called for elections.

The 1983 elections were won by a new political organization, the Motherland Party led by Turgut Özal. Although the party comprised a potentially disruptive mix of Islamic revivalists and secular liberals, Özal was able to form a majority government, to enact economic reforms, and to lead the party to another victory in the 1987 elections. Democracy was restored, and politics was back in civilian hands.

Despite the three military interventions, Turkey's commitment to a multiparty democratic system endured, and the achievements of its governments since 1950, albeit uneven, were on the whole impressive, especially considering that Turkey was experiencing a social and economic transformation in these years. A new system of multiparty democracy was introduced just as the country was entering a period of unprecedented change. Turkey was able to survive with its democratic institutions intact, if battered, because of the people's commitment to political pluralism and political freedom. This commitment had its origins in the era of stability from 1923 to 1950, during which the principles of Kemalism became embedded in the national consciousness. Other Middle Eastern states that did not have an orderly period of early independence dealt very differently with the kinds of crises Turkey overcame.

TURKISH FOREIGN POLICY AND THE CYPRUS QUESTION

In the first section of this chapter, we considered the circumstances that led to the forging of close ties between the United States and Turkey after the Second World War. The upheavals in Turkey's domestic politics did not break those ties, and active participation in the Western alliance continued to be a cornerstone of Turkey's foreign policy during the cold war. Within the Middle East, Turkey's relations with the Arab regimes were correct but somewhat uneasy because of Ankara's recognition of Israel in 1949 and its close relations with the United States.

The major stumbling block in Turkey's foreign relations was the Cyprus question. It not only affected Ankara's regional relations with Greece but also had repercussions in Washington. The Cyprus question was a legacy of Ottoman territorial expansion and British imperialism. The island, only fifty miles (eighty kilometers) off the Turkish coast, was conquered by the Ottomans in 1570–1571. During three centuries of Ottoman rule, Turks from the mainland settled among the existing Greek inhabitants. By the 1950s, Turks made up 18 percent of the island's population and formed a majority community along portions of the northern coast.

Britain occupied Cyprus in 1878 and was still administering it in the 1950s when Greek Cypriots launched a movement for the independence of the island and its eventual union with mainland Greece. The Turkish government was concerned about the security of the minority Turkish community and alarmed at the prospect of having territory so close to the Anatolian mainland come under the exclusive control of Greece. Negotiations among Britain, Greece, and Turkey produced an agreement that awarded Cyprus independence in 1960. But the new state's political structure was hedged with so many clauses protecting the rights of the two communities that Cyprus appeared to be governed by the Ottoman millet system rather than to be a unitary nation. To add to the volatility of the situation, a document known as the Treaty of Guarantee permitted Britain, Greece, and Turkey to station troops on the island and to intervene if the constitutional order was violated.

The arrangement invited a crisis. In 1964 and again in 1974, Turkey and Greece became embroiled in confrontations over Cyprus that drew in their mutual ally, the United States, and threw the southern flank of NATO into disarray. After each episode, Turkish-US relations suffered a setback.

The crisis of 1964 was precipitated by the efforts of the Greek president of Cyprus, Archbishop Makarios, to amend the constitution to limit the political rights of the Turkish community. Such efforts served only to escalate communal tensions and, finally, to cause so much mutual bloodshed that the UN sent an emergency force to patrol a neutral zone between the two communities. However, the presence of UN troops did not convince the Ankara government that the Turkish community in Cyprus was secure, and in early summer 1964, Turkey prepared to invoke its right to intervene on the basis of the clauses of the 1960 Treaty of Guarantee. As the Turkish plans for an invasion of Cyprus unfolded, US president Lyndon Johnson advised Ankara against the expedition. In a bluntly worded threat, Johnson told the prime minister at the time, Ismet Inönü, that if Turkey's planned invasion brought the Soviets into the crisis, then Washington would have to reconsider its NATO obligation to protect Turkey.

The Turkish invasion was canceled, and Inönü suffered a political embarrassment. Beyond that, Johnson's tactless treatment of a loyal US ally strained Turkish-US relations and raised questions within Turkey about the value of its ties with the United States. Many of the political demonstrations of the late 1960s centered on the US presence in Turkey, a presence that included nearly 20,000 military and civilian personnel. Turkish protesters also expressed their resentment that Turkish foreign policy appeared to be decided in Washington, not Ankara. The memories of 1964 guaranteed that the next Cyprus crisis would not unfold according to the US plan.

On July 15, 1974, Greek military forces on Cyprus staged a coup that overthrew President Makarios and brought to power a group committed to political unification with the Greek mainland. Turkey responded to this provocation without waiting for US approval; within a week of the coup, Turkish forces landed in northern Cyprus, and by August, they had occupied 37 percent of the island and extended their control well beyond the regions in which the Turkish population was concentrated.

Turkey's action prompted the US Congress to suspend all military aid and weapons sales to Turkey. Ankara reacted to the US embargo by closing several US bases in Turkey. The rupture between the two allies was partially healed in 1979 when the US embargo was canceled. However, the US response to the Cyprus invasion awakened Ankara to the dangers of relying too heavily on a single ally, and during the late 1970s, Turkey strengthened its diplomatic relations with other countries, including the Soviet Union.

The Turkish intervention brought about the partition of Cyprus into a Greek Cypriot administration in the south and a Turkish Cypriot government in the north. Turkish forces from the mainland remained in occupation of the northern section, and in 1983, the leader of the Turkish Cypriots, Rauf Denktash, proclaimed the independent Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus. Ankara was the only government to recognize it. Denktash stepped down in 2005, but eleven years and several UN-sponsored negotiating sessions later, the Greek and Turkish governments remain at odds over the Cyprus question.

IRAN: THE REESTABLISHMENT OF ROYAL AUTOCRACY

The Ruler and the Opposition, 1945–1953

Reza Shah's abdication in 1941 opened the way for a revival of political activity. The new ruler, Muhammad Reza Shah, was almost overwhelmed by the combination of domestic unrest and foreign pressure to which his government was subjected during the first twelve years of his reign. Had it not been for Anglo-US intervention in 1953, the shah might have lost his throne, and the course of postwar Iranian history would have taken a different direction.

Having received a political and military education closely supervised by his father, Muhammad Reza (1919–1980) assumed the throne in 1941. With his country under Anglo-Soviet occupation, he had little room to maneuver. For the next twelve years, the monarchy was insecure, and the ruler was forced to share power with other institutions.

The elements that had been silenced by Reza Shah's oppression reasserted themselves and sought to recover the status they had enjoyed prior to 1925. Prominent among them were the tribal leaders, the ulama, and the traditional landowning elite. Opposing them were interest groups that had benefited from Reza Shah's rule and were determined to retain the power they had acquired during his reign. The officer corps of the armed forces was the most significant of these groups. At the same time, new social, economic, and ideological interests entered the political arena and pressed for sweeping reforms. The advocates of reform were from diverse social and occupational groupings, ranging from the emergent labor movement and the new middle class of professionals to the older generation of constitutional liberals. The most widely supported reformist organization was the Tudeh (Masses) Party. Founded in 1941 by a coalition of young Marxists, Tudeh directed its appeals to a broad cross-section of the population: It endorsed labor legislation and land reform for workers and peasants, promised political rights for women, and supported improved wages for lower-level civil servants. Although Tudeh had a Marxist orientation and adopted a pro-Soviet stance, its leaders avoided labeling themselves Communists so as not to alienate the religious establishment and popular religious sentiment in general. During the 1940s, the party expanded its national base and became Iran's largest, most efficiently run political organization. There were expectations among both Iranians and foreign observers that Tudeh might soon control the government.

The 1940s saw further discord introduced into Iranian politics by the actions of Britain, the Soviet Union, and the United States, each of which endeavored to cultivate influence among local factions in order to further its own interests. Britain, as it had done in the period before Reza Shah, encouraged cooperation between the monarchy and such status quo-oriented groupings as the large landowners and the powerful tribes. This was the type of alliance that had served the British so well in the Arab countries and the one they favored for Iran. The Soviet Union, for its part, supported Tudeh activity, whereas the United States, a relative newcomer to the contest for influence in Iran, tended to back any faction that opposed Soviet ambitions. US advisers developed close ties with the Iranian armed forces.

As political instability and foreign interference continued to undermine the government and the economy in the late 1940s, the central political question revolved around the issue of who would govern Iran: Would it be the elected parliament and cabinet, or would the shah impose his personal rule, as his father had? At first, it appeared that the young shah was being forced to move in the direction of establishing a constitutional monarchy. He lacked both personal charisma and religious legitimacy, and his control of the political system and ties to the country at large were tenuous. He was particularly vulnerable to criticism in the one area on which most Iranians, of whatever political coloring, were united—the issue of foreign domination. In the early 1950s, he was to be contested on this issue by the most widespread movement of popular protest in postwar Iran up to the revolution that finally toppled him in 1979.

Muhammad Mosaddiq and the Oil Nationalization Crisis, 1951–1953

To appreciate the appeal of Muhammad Mosaddiq and his National Front organization, we must remember that Iran, although never a colony or a protectorate, was nonetheless denied its sovereignty throughout the first half of the twentieth century. From the disadvantageous concessions granted by the Qajar shahs to the unfavorable oil agreement signed by Reza Shah in 1933, Iran's economic development was placed largely in the hands of European entrepreneurs; from the Russo-British invasion in 1914 to the Soviet-British occupation of 1941, Iran's independence was violated whenever it suited European Great Powers to do so. Cultural disrespect, economic domination, and imperial manipulation characterized Europe's relationship with Iran for much of the century leading up to 1950. Virtually all sectors of Iranian society resented the intrusions of foreigners, whether they were Soviet engineers, British oil experts, or US military advisers. Many Iranians also leveled their discontent at the monarchs who had allowed foreign domination in the first place. These sentiments found a spokesman in Muhammad Mosaddiq, whose nationalist beliefs and personal appeal overshadowed the shah and threw Iran into a major international and domestic crisis from 1950 to 1953.

The individual whose name is linked to one of the most significant episodes in modern Iranian history was an unlikely figure to head a populist, antiroyalist movement. Mosaddiq (1882–1967) was born into a landed aristocratic family and studied at universities in Paris and Switzerland, earning a doctorate in law. He entered state service in 1915 and, for several years, led an active political life as cabinet minister, provincial governor, and Majlis deputy. Mosaddiq earned a reputation as a politician of impeccable honesty and integrity. He also became known for his support of parliamentary democracy and his strong opposition to foreign activities in Iran. In the late 1930s, he was placed under house arrest for his objections to Reza Shah's authoritarianism; he reentered politics as an elected member of the Majlis in 1943.

Throughout the late 1940s, Mosaddiq's impassioned campaign against continued foreign interference in Iran and his warnings about the dangers of abandoning democracy for royal dictatorship galvanized widespread support. In 1949, several political parties and interest groups joined together under Mosaddiq's leadership to form the National Front. This broad-based coalition was dominated by elements from both the traditional and the modern middle classes, including, for example, ulama who advocated a greater role for the shari'ah and Western-educated professionals who pushed for new measures of secularization. What brought them together was their common opposition to foreign influence and the expansion of royal authority.

The issue that propelled Mosaddiq and the National Front to political prominence was the control of the Iranian oil industry by the Britishdominated Anglo-Iranian Oil Company (AIOC). By the late 1940s, the AIOC had built up such a massive presence throughout the country that it was practically a state within a state. Not only did the AIOC construct its own company town at Abadan, site of the world's largest oil refinery, it also supplied its own municipal services, built its own roads and airports, and negotiated its own security arrangements with neighboring tribes. Foreigners held management and clerical positions, and Iranians were employed only as laborers. Although the AIOC was a private enterprise, the British government owned the majority of its stock. Iranians viewed the company as just another manifestation of British influence in their country.

The Iranian government was displeased with the terms of the concession Reza Shah signed with the AIOC in 1933 (see Chapter 10) and, in the late 1940s, negotiated revisions. In 1950, the revisions were submitted to the Majlis, where they met with the determined opposition of Mosaddiq and the National Front deputies. Branding the AIOC as an arm of the British government, Mosaddiq called for the cancellation of the concession and the nationalization of the Iranian oil industry. As Mosaddiq and his allies organized demonstrations and gave speeches to win over public opinion, one of the ulama members of the National Front equated the oil issue with the very essence of Iran's being, urging "serious Muslims and patriotic citizens to fight against the enemies of Islam and Iran by joining the nationalization struggle."³ In 1951, amid the wave of popular enthusiasm generated by the National Front's campaign, the Majlis took two bold steps: It passed legislation nationalizing the oil industry, and it invited Mosaddiq to become prime minister. Mosaddiq's tumultuous term in office (May 1951–August 1953) was devoted to much more than the dispute between Iran and the AIOC; it was also devoted to a struggle for Iran's political future.

In response to the passage of the oil nationalization law, the AIOC called for a worldwide boycott of Iranian oil. The British government swiftly became a party to the crisis by endorsing the boycott, reinforcing its naval forces in the Persian Gulf, and imposing economic sanctions on Iran. When the United States joined the boycott in 1952, Iran was effectively prevented from selling its oil on the international market, and the country was plunged into a financial crisis by the almost total loss of oil revenues.

Despite the economic hardships, Mosaddiq refused to compromise on nationalization, and in October 1952, his government severed diplomatic relations with Britain.

Iran's confrontation with the AIOC and Britain produced a domestic as well as an international crisis. Mosaddiq was determined not only to break the stranglehold of foreign interests in Iran but also to reinstate the parliamentary institutions proclaimed in the 1906 constitution. This involved him in a power struggle with the shah and the shah's new Great Power patron, the United States. In 1952, the Majlis granted Mosaddiq emergency powers, which he used to launch an attack on the monarchy. He obtained a ruling from a special parliamentary committee that placed the armed forces under the control of the government, not of the shah. Mosaddiq also reduced the size of the army, purged the officer corps, and introduced land reforms. This assault on entrenched interests was part of his plan to replace the personal rule of the monarch with the rule of constitutional law, to make the military subject to the will of the parliament rather than the sovereign, and to redistribute the wealth and land of the privileged elite.

Despite general support for his objectives, Mosaddiq was a reformer without adequate revenue, and he struggled to implement the programs on which his popularity depended. As Iran's revenues sank because of the worldwide oil boycott, unemployment and prices rose. These adversities provided leftist organizations, especially the Tudeh Party, with opportunities to attract discontented workers. Moreover, the zeal with which Mosaddiq pursued far-reaching social changes alarmed some in the National Front, especially the ulama, who became suspicious at the secular direction of the reforms. In 1953, the National Front began to disintegrate as the conservative religious parties and other groups on the political right defected from the coalition. The unraveling of the National Front allowed the Tudeh to reemerge as the country's major political force. At the same time, a group of disaffected military officers formed a secret committee to plot Mosaddiq's overthrow and the reestablishment of royal authority.

The military conspirators' goals coincided with those of the US and British governments. Fearing that Mosaddiq had lost control of the situation in Iran and that the revived Tudeh would lead the country into the Soviet camp, Washington, with assistance from London, dispatched CIA agents to Tehran to assist the Iranian officers in organizing a coup against Mosaddiq. The shah agreed to the coup in advance and signed a decree appointing the leader of the secret committee, General Fazallah Zahedi, prime minister. When the first coup attempt failed miserably, the shah fled to Rome. However, three days later, on August 19, 1953, the royalist military forces struck again and captured the prime minister. The shah returned to consolidate the monarchy.

From 1951 to 1953, Mosaddiq had mobilized Iranian society in an attempt to recover national sovereignty and establish an alternative to royal autocracy. His overthrow marked the triumph of the forces to which he was opposed. Indeed, the coup of 1953 brought about the return of royal dictatorship—and an intensification of US interference in Iran's domestic affairs.

Consolidation of the Royal Dictatorship After 1953

One observer remarked that “the 1953 coup brought down an iron curtain on Iranian politics.”⁴ That curtain remained closed for the next twenty-six years as the shah took steps to make sure that the circumstances that had nearly cost him his throne would not recur.

The oil dispute that had given Mosaddiq his political platform was quickly settled by an arrangement that granted Iran a 50 percent share of the petroleum profits. Iranian oil rapidly recovered its place in the international market and provided the government with ever-increasing revenues. The shah also undertook to improve Iran's standing with the Western powers. Diplomatic relations with Britain were restored in 1954, and the shah proclaimed his commitment to the Western alliance and to a program of economic development on the Western model. Such diplomatic loyalty and economic emulation, he hoped, would translate into substantial infusions of US aid. The shah was not disappointed on that score; between 1953 and 1963, the United States provided Iran with $500 million in military assistance.

The shah dealt harshly with the groups that had opposed him, disbanding the National Front and imprisoning its leaders, including Mosaddiq. The regime's security forces also made a concerted effort to destroy the Tudeh Party, uncovering its underground networks, jailing hundreds of its members, and executing and torturing dozens of its leaders. To squelch the reemergence of organized opposition, the shah, with US and Israeli assistance, established an internal security organization, SAVAK, that became notorious for its pervasive surveillance operations and its brutal treatment of the political prisoners who packed Iran's jails. From 1953 to 1979, although there were periods when limited political expression was permitted, the overall picture was one of repression, manipulation, and coercion. Elections to the Majlis were controlled, and the two-party system the shah adopted to provide the appearance of democracy was so tightly restricted that Iranians referred to the two organizations as the "yes" and the "yes sir" parties.⁵

A short-lived challenge to this repressive system occurred from 1960 to 1963 when the country experienced one of its periodic economic downturns, and the shah, under pressure from the United States to liberalize his regime, allowed the National Front to participate in election campaigns. The criticism of the regime by the National Front candidates, the government's obvious manipulation of the election results, and the worsening economic conditions all combined to provoke an outbreak of strikes and demonstrations. The protest movement reached a climax in 1963 when a relatively unknown member of the religious establishment, Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, began to preach against the regime and its US ally. Khomeini denounced the shah for corruption, for neglecting the rights of the oppressed masses, and for compromising Iran's sovereignty. He further accused the regime of ignoring the country's Islamic beliefs by selling oil to Israel and granting economic concessions to the United States. In June 1963, SAVAK arrested Khomeini. When word of the arrest spread, Tehran and other major cities exploded in antigovernment demonstrations that continued for three days before the military could crush them—at the cost of hundreds, possibly thousands of lives. Khomeini was exiled to Turkey in 1964; a year later, he was deported to Iraq, where he continued to write and preach until 1978, when he was forced to leave Iraq for France.

The disturbances of 1963 once again revealed the religious establishment's ability to mobilize the masses by applying Islamic principles to contemporary conditions. The protests also showed the continued existence of deeply held emotions about foreign economic and political activities in Iran. In this case, the emotions were directed against an oppressive ruler who was charged with binding the country's destiny to an alien power whose interests were not necessarily in harmony with Iran's own.

The regime recognized these as dangerous signs. Accordingly, once the disturbances were quelled, the shah paid renewed attention to the institutions on which his power rested. These included an extensive network of court patronage, the government's control of appointments in the expanding civil bureaucracy, and the armed forces. This latter organization was the shah's personal favorite. He viewed the destinies of the military and the monarchy as inextricably linked. He frequently appeared in public in military dress, and his statement "I am the army" encapsulated his view of his relationship to the armed forces.⁶ To keep the officer corps loyal, he provided them with well-appointed clubs, access to imported luxury goods, and high salaries. In addition to building up the Iranian armed forces to provide domestic security for his regime, the shah wished to turn Iran into a major regional military power. He lavished huge sums on military equipment, acquiring sophisticated and expensive weaponry.

The funds the shah used to satisfy his desires for military equipment came as a result of the quadrupling of oil prices brought on by the oil boycott the Arab-producing states imposed during the 1973 Arab-Israeli war (see Chapter 21). The revenue increases were staggering: In the decade from 1964 to 1974, Iran's total oil revenue was $13 billion; in the year 1975–1976 alone, it reached $20 billion. The United States encouraged the shah, a loyal ally, to use Iran's oil wealth to acquire advanced weapons, allowing him to purchase virtually any non-nuclear US weapons system he desired. After expenditures of more than $10 billion on arms between 1972 and 1976, Iran had the world's fifth-largest military force, an army of some 400,000 men equipped with more British Chieftain tanks than the British forces themselves had, and an air force bristling with Phantom fighters, helicopter gunships, and missile-carrying Tomcat aircraft.

As in the nineteenth-century Ottoman Empire and Egypt, the importation of foreign-made weapons systems meant the employment of foreign instructors. The arrival of thousands of agents of US defense contractors, with their high salaries, access to scarce housing, and sometimes less than tactful comportment, led to the alienation of countless Iranians, notably those who considered the shah's fascination with the West an affront to Iran's cultural integrity and national sovereignty.

Reform from Above: The White Revolution and Its Effects

Although the shah's primary concern was to consolidate his personal power, he was also committed to transforming Iran along Western lines. However, the program of royal reform contained a contradiction: As much as the shah tried to modernize Iran's productive capacities, he would not permit any challenges to the monarchy. As a consequence, Iran experienced major economic and social changes but did not witness a corresponding change in the traditional system of royal authoritarianism. This produced conflict between the shah, who determined what would and would not be included in the reforms, and the large portion of the Iranian population who wished to see the political system opened up and freedom of expression permitted.

The shah's proposals for concentrated reform were announced in 1963 as the White Revolution, a term intended to imply reform without bloodshed. Of the twelve points set forth in the original program, the most important from the shah's perspective were land reform and the establishment of a literacy corps. Land reform had a political as well as a social purpose and was therefore among the most contentious goals of the White Revolution. It was designed to strike at the power of the large absentee landlords by limiting their individual holdings to one village. They were required to sell the excess to the state, which then redistributed it to peasant cultivators. The reform achieved its political purpose in that the shah succeeded in introducing the authority of the central state into the countryside and limiting the power of the landed elite. In addition, the traditional peasant role of subservient sharecropper was transformed into that of small private landowner freed from the obligations that had bound him to the will of the landlord.

In the countryside, the results of the land reform were mixed. When the program was officially ended in 1971, the shah proclaimed that "there is no longer any farmer in the country who does not own his own land."⁷

Although the monarch's claim fell a few hundred thousand sharecroppers short of reality, the reforms did bring about a substantial redistribution of Iran's agricultural land. An estimated 92 percent of former sharecroppers—nearly 2 million people—became peasant proprietors under the redistribution program. However, it was questionable whether the new proprietors gained any real economic benefits from their ownership rights. A few did become self-sufficient farmers, but around 75 percent received plots that were less than the minimum size needed to sustain a rural family at a basic subsistence level. This latter group, an embittered and disillusioned sector of the countryside, was either forced back into the paid rural labor force or became part of the huge migration to the urban centers. Such migration was further intensified by the large-scale use of mechanized farm equipment, a practice that created rural unemployment by reducing the need for labor.

The literacy corps, the second key element of the White Revolution, was part of a campaign to reduce rural illiteracy, which ran as high as 80 percent. The members of the corps, who were military conscripts with at least a high school diploma, spent fifteen months in rural villages teaching primary school and conducting night school classes for adults. Between 1963 and 1978, some 100,000 of these so-called soldiers of knowledge served in the countryside. Similar programs were introduced in the fields of health care and construction.

In addition to the specific projects set forth in the White Revolution, the shah inaugurated ambitious programs for economic and social development. Iran's internal and external communications were improved through road and railway construction and the expansion of port facilities. The state invested heavily in industrial enterprises, and after 1963, Iran's industrial output climbed so steeply that the shah predicted his country would be one of the world's five major industrial powers by the year 2000. A corresponding increase in the number of workers accompanied Iran's rising industrial capacity. However, because the state-controlled labor organizations deprived wage earners of true collective bargaining rights, wages remained low while the prices of basic consumer items rose, sowing seeds for future discontent.

The shah also used Iran's oil revenues to advance education and health care. Between 1963 and 1977, elementary school enrollment grew from 1.6

million to over 4 million, and university enrollment increased nearly sevenfold to 154,215. Meanwhile, the numbers of hospitals, health clinics, and trained physicians rose as well. Improved health care helped to reduce the infant mortality rate and led to a growth spurt in the population from 25.8 million in 1966 to 33.4 million ten years later. As in Turkey's case, the population boom was accompanied by an even sharper rise in the number of people living in cities. Rural migrants poured into Tehran, the hub of the new industrial enterprises, and turned Iran's capital into a sprawling, overcrowded metropolis of nearly 4.5 million people by 1976.

The shah's obsession with Western models of development led him to grudgingly accept the usefulness of expanding educational and employment opportunities for women. One of the original points in the White Revolution was the enfranchisement of women. In 1967 and 1975, family protection laws were announced, granting women greater legal equality within marriage. The laws did not abolish polygamy but required the husband to obtain consent from his current wife before taking an additional one. Compared to the legislation passed in Turkey, Iran's efforts to change the status of women were very modest.

Over time, the White Revolution became the justification for the shah's rule. Eager to legitimize his reign on grounds other than the naked use of force, he gave his reformist programs pseudo-progressive labels that masked his dictatorial style and helped to deflect criticism of his corrupt and repressive regime. To be sure, there was substance to many of the new programs, but their benefits were limited to the privileged few. Land reform was allowed to languish after its promising beginnings, leaving peasants with dashed hopes and landlords with lingering suspicions. The regime's preference for large-scale industrial enterprises and its encouragement of foreign investment undercut the traditional bazaar economy and destroyed the handicraft industry. Thus, despite producing substantial advances in social services and economic performance, the White Revolution did not create popular loyalty to the regime.

In a parallel effort to establish the legitimacy of his rule, the shah placed great stress on the Pahlavi dynasty as the heir to the pre-Islamic Acheminid and Sasanian dynasties. His father had already appropriated for the monarchy the ancient Iranian royal title shahanshah (king of kings), to which Muhammad Reza Shah added the term aryamehr (light of the Aryans). In emphasizing the achievements of the pre-Islamic Iranian empires, the shah virtually ignored Iran's rich Islamic past and made no convincing connections between his reign and the religious traditions of the Iranian people. His attempt to link the glories of Cyrus the Great and the Acheminids to the reign of the Pahlavis, with lavish ceremonies held at Persepolis in 1971 to commemorate 2,500 continuous years of Iranian monarchy, was rumored to cost $100 million and attracted ridicule abroad and criticism at home.

Try as he might, the shah was unable fully to establish the political legitimacy of his dynasty or to project the image of a ruler who truly cared about Iran and its people. This failure no doubt came about in part because of the corruption and maladministration that characterized his government. The shah and his family skimmed millions of dollars a year from Iran's revenues for their private use, and favored courtiers extracted small fortunes from foreign firms in exchange for arranging import licenses and contacts in high places. There was much money to be made in Iran in the early 1970s—but mainly by those with connections to the court.

The twin ills of uneven income distribution and political repression alienated broad sections of the population from the regime. However, the closed political system and the ruthless effectiveness of SAVAK denied Iranians any formal channels through which to express their grievances. As a result, opposition movements resorted to violence. Beginning in the late 1960s, urban guerrilla groups mounted a campaign of terror against representatives of the state and its US ally. The two largest organizations were the Marxist Fadayan-i Khalq and the Islamic leftist Mujahedin-i Khalq. Both groups drew their membership from the young intelligentsia. Although the guerrilla movements were decimated through arrests and executions, their activities throughout the 1970s kept alive a spirit of resistance among Iranians.

The religious establishment mounted more indirect opposition. Not all ulama were against the regime, but the majority resented one aspect or another of the shah's policies. Measures such as land reform directly threatened the ulama's livelihood by providing the state with an excuse to appropriate waqf lands, the revenues of which contributed to the upkeep of mosques and seminaries. Other programs allowed the state to intrude into spheres that had previously been the ulama's exclusive domain. For example, the literacy corps provided an educational alternative to the primary religious schools, long the sole source of instruction for villagers in remote regions. Other reforms, such as the changes in the status of women, were questioned on religious grounds. The shah attempted to counter the ulama's objections by contending that his reforms were compatible with Islam because they would bring about justice and equality, and he suggested that the ulama should confine themselves to matters of personal piety.

Although the shah's regime posed a threat to the economic status of the religious establishment, the ulama were not motivated by self-interest alone. Ulama activists objected to the monarch's autocracy and the corruption that permeated his regime, noting that these practices contravened Islamic concepts of social justice. They also denounced the shah's total reliance on Western models of development and his encouragement of Western patterns of consumption and living, practices that, in the ulama's view, promoted inequality and impropriety. Although the regime's repressive organs made it dangerous for the ulama to express their opposition openly, their intimate links with the Iranian masses afforded them ample opportunities to make their opinions known.

In 1975, partly as a response to the activities of the urban guerrillas, the shah tightened the reins of repression. He scrapped the two-party system and introduced a single organization known as the National Resurgence Party. This change to a one-party state intensified the regime's totalitarian character and ushered in a period of harsh police rule involving arrests, censorship, and systematic torture in the prisons. It appeared that the regime, buttressed by a powerful military and a ruthless security force, had taken steps to ensure its survival for decades to come.

CONCLUSION

Both Turkey and Iran shared a border with the Soviet Union, and both appeared vulnerable to Soviet designs in the immediate aftermath of World War II. This geopolitical situation drew the two countries into the cold war rivalry between the United States and the Soviet Union. The United States, determined to contain the spread of communism, provided economic and military assistance to keep Turkey and Iran politically stable and militarily strong. Both countries accepted US economic aid and participated in the Anglo-US alliance system. However, the US role in overthrowing Mosaddiq and the presence of thousands of US military personnel in Turkey bred anti-US sentiment. The United States appeared to be assuming Britain's former role as an imperial power interested in dominating the Middle East for its own ends. The Turks and Iranians who viewed the United States from this perspective came to resent the diminution of national sovereignty that was implied in their governments' readiness to follow the US line in foreign policy.

Although Turkey and Iran had in common certain patterns of social and demographic change during this period, the political institutions through which popular responses to change were expressed were quite different. Turkey's multiparty democracy contrasted sharply with the shah's royal dictatorship. On those occasions when the Turkish parliamentary system became stalemated, the cause was largely the proliferation of political parties and interest groups. But in Iran, the social and economic interest groups created by the shah's modernization programs had no political outlet through which to voice their needs. Even the three interventions of the Turkish military reveal the differences between the two countries. The Turkish armed forces intervened in the political system to resolve parliamentary deadlock and economic turmoil, not to perpetuate military rule. By contrast, the Iranian military was used to maintain the shah's dictatorial control; common interests bound the military and the monarchy.

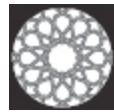

During the 1970s, these two political systems faced growing pressures as a result of the social and economic changes within each state. The Turkish military's inclination to step in whenever parliamentary deadlock threatened the social order raised questions about the survival of the civilian multiparty system that was hailed as such an achievement in 1950. In Iran, the staggering oil wealth created enormous discrepancies in income and had the potential to generate popular dissatisfaction on the part of those at the lower end of the economic scale. Yet the shah's domestic security forces, backed by the power of the military, appeared to be in a position to crush any and all popular dissent.

CHAPTER 15

THE MIDDLE EAST IN THE AGE OF NASSER

The Egyptian Base

During the period from 1952 to 1967, Gamal Abd al-Nasser embodied what the Arab world wanted to be: assertive, independent, and immersed in constructing a new society freed from the imperial past and oriented toward a bright Arab future. Other Arab states copied his initiatives, and so dominant was his stature that such terms as Nasserism and Nasserites became common. Many of his achievements turned out to be more apparent than real, but for a time, he presented the Arab world with the image of a dynamic leader who defied the imperial powers and swept away the old ruling elite. He seemed to represent progressive reformism in contrast to the old elite's stagnant immobility, and he projected a spirit of hope that made many believe in the possibility of the rebirth of a powerful new Arab order capable of avenging the defeat of 1948 and preserving Arab independence in the face of external pressures. For the inspiration he provided and the influence he exercised, it is appropriate to identify his years in power as the age of Nasser.

THE PARALYSIS OF THE OLD REGIME, 1945–1952

The end of the Second World War ushered in renewed Anglo-Egyptian tensions. The treaty of 1936, which placed restrictions on Egyptian sovereignty, still governed relations between the two countries. A succession of Egyptian governments tried to persuade Britain to renegotiate the treaty and evacuate its troops. However, even though Britain conceded independence to India in 1947, it was not prepared to abandon the Suez Canal and was therefore unwilling to grant the Egyptian demands. The government's failure to secure unqualified independence added to the stresses within the country and fueled popular resentment against both the British and the Egyptian ruling class of landowning politicians that had dominated parliament since 1923. The other pillar of the ruling establishment, King Faruq, also failed to inspire popular loyalty. His scandalous personal behavior and his close association with Egypt's humiliating defeat in the 1948–1949 Arab-Israeli war discredited his reputation. Lacking decisive leadership, Egypt drifted into a situation of perpetual political crisis.

One of the main causes of the alienation of the masses from their ruling elite was the growing gap between rich and poor. This was clearly evident in the Egyptian countryside as large private landholdings became increasingly concentrated in the hands of a few owners. By 1952, about 0.4 percent of Egyptian landowners possessed 35 percent of the country's cultivable land. At the other end of the scale, 94 percent of landowners possessed a mere 35 percent of the cultivable land. The average size of the holdings of the first group was 170 feddans; the second group owned plots of land averaging 0.8 feddan. The massive inequality in land distribution created growing wealth for the large landowners and impoverished the small proprietors, who were forced, with greater and greater frequency, to sell their holdings to meet their debts. The landless peasants, who neither owned nor rented land but relied on their labor for income, faced even harsher conditions after World War II. Making up more than half of the rural population, they saw their wages constantly depressed as their numbers increased.

This situation cried out for redress, but the leaders of the Wafd and other political parties derived their wealth and social status from land ownership and were not inclined to address the issue of rural reform. The festering discontent in the countryside had its counterpart in Cairo and Alexandria, where the expanding labor force lived and worked in substandard conditions, university students organized anti-British demonstrations, and recent migrants from the countryside eked out a bare existence. Although postwar governments did manage to introduce limited social welfare legislation, it was inadequate to ameliorate mass poverty or to allay mass distrust of the ruling politicians.

In this volatile atmosphere, the Muslim Brotherhood expanded its activities and reached the apogee of its power. By the late 1940s, it claimed over 500,000 members and many more sympathizers. Egyptians were attracted to the brotherhood by its blending of calls for national independence and the preservation of Islamic values with an appealing program of social reform (see Chapter 11). In the immediate postwar years, militant members of the brotherhood engaged in a systematic campaign of violence against foreigners, foreign business establishments, and Egyptian officials regarded as accomplices of imperialism. When Prime Minister Mahmud Fahmi al-Nuqrashi attempted to clamp down on the organization's activities in 1948, the brotherhood assassinated him. The following year Hasan al-Banna, the brotherhood's founding leader, was himself murdered, most likely by the Egyptian security forces. These acts demonstrate the extent of the political disorder and social disarray into which Egypt had plunged during the old regime's final years.

In an attempt to return the country to normalcy, King Faruq called for elections in 1950. The Wafd was once again victorious, and its venerable leader, al-Nahhas Pasha, assumed the prime ministership. Hoping to recover some of the nationalist aura that had once surrounded his party, al-Nahhas in 1951 proclaimed the abrogation of the 1936 treaty. The British government, in the midst of dealing with the Mosaddiq crisis in Iran, was not prepared to make concessions to Egypt. However, the abrogation of the treaty was popular among Egyptians, and armed bands of Egyptian guerrillas began to engage in skirmishes with units of the British army. In one such clash, British tanks destroyed the Egyptian police barracks at Isma‘iliyya, killing fifty policemen and wounding scores more. On the following day, January 26, 1952, known as Black Saturday, the masses of Cairo retaliated for the incident with a flurry of demonstrations and riots. A number of fires were set, and Cairo's central business district went up in flames. The angry mobs did not confine themselves to destroying British property; they also attacked bars, cinemas, nightclubs, and exclusive boutiques—symbols of Egyptian upper-class corruption and immorality.

The breakdown of law and order on Black Saturday hastened the end of the old rule. Although the regime survived for a few more months, it was overthrown in the early morning hours of July 23, 1952, when a group of young military officers staged a coup d'état and took over the government. Far more than a brief military intervention, it was the replacement of one regime by another. Two of the officers involved in the coup, Nasser and Sadat, were to govern Egypt for the next twenty-nine years.

THE FREE OFFICERS AND THE COUP D'ÉTAT OF 1952

The coup—or the revolution of 1952, as it came to be called—was planned by a group of junior military officers, many of whom had known one another since the early 1940s. Styling themselves the Free Officers, the group coalesced around an executive committee of nine (later fourteen) men headed by Colonel Gamal Abd al-Nasser (1918–1970). Nasser's background and experiences were typical of the Free Officers and illustrate the influences that shaped the new generation of Egyptian rulers. His father was a rural villager who moved to Alexandria, where he entered the postal service as a minor clerk and where his first son, Gamal, was born. Nasser's mother died when he was eight, his father was transferred, and the young Nasser grew up living with relatives in Cairo and Alexandria. In high school, he was exposed to all the political crosscurrents of the 1930s and, like so many students of his generation, participated in anti-British demonstrations and was wounded during the protests of 1935.

Adrift and alienated after his high school graduation in 1936, he attended law school for a few months before being accepted at the Egyptian military academy, which had just opened its doors to the lower and lower-middle classes. Commissioned in 1938, he spent the war years on postings in the Sudan and the Western Desert, during which time he established contacts with several of the individuals who later formed the executive committee of the Free Officers. Like several members of that group, Nasser fought in the Palestine campaign in 1948. Although his performance was commendable, he and his fellow officers suffered the humiliation of the Egyptian defeat by Israel, an outcome they believed to have been caused by the corruption of King Faruq, the civilian politicians, and certain figures in the high command. Nasser and his colleagues saw it as their patriotic duty to avenge the “disaster” of 1948.

Nasser and several of the core participants in the Free Officers movement were not the scions of the landed or professional elite but rather the sons of small peasant proprietors, minor government officials, and petty merchants. Others in the group came from families that were more solidly middle class, but they were all from the strata of society that chafed under the British occupation and harbored grievances at the indigenous ruling classes. They also represented the emergence of a new generation into positions of authority—at the time of the coup, they were all junior officers and their ages ranged from twenty-eight to thirty-five, a marked difference from the seventy-five-year-old al-Nahhas, who had headed the Wafd since 1927. Indeed, they recognized that their youth and obscurity might prevent them from winning public support, and before carrying out the coup, they persuaded a respected senior officer, General Muhammad Naguib, to serve as their figurehead leader. Naguib was one of the few Egyptian commanders to emerge from the 1948 conflict with his reputation intact, and he soon became the regime’s most popular figure.

The core group of Free Officers comprised pragmatic nationalists and “diligent military bureaucrats” with no predetermined views on political organization or ideological orientation.¹ They were motivated by a patriotic desire to end the British occupation and by vague notions of reform and social justice. In 1951, while still a clandestine group within the military, the Free Officers prepared a six-point program to guide their government after the coup. The program called for the destruction of British colonialism and the removal of its Egyptian collaborators, the elimination of feudalism, the ending of the political control of the state by foreign capital, the establishment of social justice, the formation of a strong national army, and the creation of a healthy democratic life.

Once the officers assumed power, they formed themselves into a Nasser-led organization called the Revolutionary Command Council (RCC) that served as the government’s executive body. Because the RCC had no preconceived plan for administering the country, it tended to respond to situations as they arose, and in this way, the regime gradually took shape and found its direction. However, no organization headed by Nasser was ever completely without plans, and in the process of consolidating its power, the RCC conducted a twofold campaign: It undertook to do away with rival contenders for power and at the same time tried to gain popular support by proclaiming reforms and introducing a new constitution.

The first rival to be dealt with was King Faruq. Three days after the coup, he was forced to abdicate and sent into exile. The last ruler in the line of Muhammad Ali sailed out of Alexandria harbor on the royal yacht, destined to idle away the remainder of his life on the French Riviera. In 1953, the monarchy was abolished, and Egypt was declared a republic. Turning to the Wafd and the other parliamentary parties, the RCC announced sweeping political changes that effectively eliminated the old order: The constitution of 1923 was abolished, parliament was dissolved, and all political parties were banned. The regime went on to declare a three-year transitional period during which the RCC would act as the supreme executive. Naguib assumed the offices of president and prime minister; Nasser remained behind the scenes as minister of the interior. Other RCC members replaced the civilian politicians in the cabinet, and additional officers oversaw the bureaucracy. The military was assuming complete control of the state. In 1954, another RCC decree prohibited anyone who had held public office from 1946 to 1952 from doing so again. This effectively barred most of the politicians of the old order from participation in public life and opened the way for a new generation from a different social stratum to assume positions of authority in the bureaucracy. To fill the void created by the abolition of political parties, the RCC organized a mass party called the Liberation Rally. It was not a party in the parliamentary sense but, rather, a vehicle through which the regime marshaled support for itself and gained control of such interest groups as students and workers. As the only party permitted in the country, the Liberation Rally failed to generate much enthusiasm.

The RCC's main rival for power was the Muslim Brotherhood, which was far and away Egypt's most popular political organization. At the time of the coup in 1952, many of the Free Officers had close ties to the brotherhood, and there was an early phase of cooperation between the two organizations, as each hoped eventually to control the other. However, they could not coexist, and in 1954, the RCC got an excuse to strike when a member of the brotherhood tried to assassinate Nasser. The RCC retaliated by outlawing the brotherhood, executing six of its leaders, and imprisoning thousands of its members. Though driven underground, the organization was neither forgotten nor eliminated and would be heard from again. The RCC also struck hard against the political Left. Shortly after the coup, workers at a large textile plant near Alexandria went on strike and rampaged through the factory in the name of the people's revolution. Expecting sympathy from the new regime, the workers were instead crushed by it. The RCC ordered the army to put down the strike, arranged for the trial and execution of its ringleaders, and took advantage of the existence of labor unrest to imprison leaders of the Communist Party and other leftists.

It was also crucial for the RCC to establish control of the armed forces and ensure their loyalty. To this end, Nasser elevated his close friend and former Free Officer Abd al-Hakim Amr to commander in chief, a position Amr occupied as the regime's political operative within the military for the next fifteen years. The contest for power between Naguib and Nasser that broke into the open in early 1954 severely strained relations between the military and the RCC—and within the RCC itself. Instead of acting as the purely figurehead president that the RCC intended, Naguib became a popular public personality and began to express his own views on the direction of the revolution, which often differed from Nasser's. But Nasser was determined to retain control of the movement, and he waged a bitter public and private struggle against Naguib. Nasser proved the better infighter, and in November 1954, Naguib was accused of supporting the Muslim Brotherhood, removed from office, and placed under house arrest until his death in 1984. Within two years of the coup, Nasser had broken the existing centers of civilian power, purged the military of potential rivals, and maneuvered himself into position as Egypt's commanding political force.

Concurrent with consolidating power, the RCC tried to build popular support by introducing reforms. Its most acclaimed achievement was the Agrarian Reform Law of September 1952. The law's main provision limited the amount of agricultural land a single individual could own to 200 feddans. The state would take over the surplus for redistribution in small plots to tenants or to peasants who owned less than five feddans. Landlords would be compensated in Egyptian government bonds. The lands and properties of the royal family were confiscated and included in the redistribution program. In addition to offering benefits to peasants, the regime's purpose in breaking up the landed estates was to reduce the political and economic power of the landholding elite. It can hardly be said that the old landowning classes were stripped of all their wealth, but unquestionably the reduction of their holdings contributed to the decline of their overall influence. Although the land reform laws were imperfectly administered, they demonstrated the new regime's repudiation of the old social, economic, and political order. Land reform became a hallmark of the Nasser era and was praised both inside and outside Egypt in the regime's early years.

Coupled with laws that abolished all civil titles (pasha, bey), land reform imparted a reformist, populist image to the regime. Nasser may have hoped to solidify this image with the new constitution, which was announced in 1956 at the end of the three-year transitional period. The document echoed the sentiments of the early Free Officers movement; it stated that the government was committed to the abolition of imperialism and feudalism and to the establishment of a strong army, social justice, and a democratic society. The constitution enshrined the principle of democracy, in theory at least, by providing for an elected, 350-member national assembly. A change from the old order was the inclusion of a bill of rights protecting Egyptians from discrimination on the grounds of race, sex, language, or religion.

Still, the open, pluralistic society proclaimed in the constitution was highly circumscribed by the manner in which the state allocated authority. The Nasserist political system sought to guide the popular will, not to respond to it. Political parties were banned, and the ineffectual Liberation Rally was replaced by another mass organization, the National Union. The National Union's executive committee, headed by Nasser, nominated and screened all candidates to the national assembly. Constitutional provisions that gave extensive powers to the president further centralized decision-making authority. In June 1956, a national plebiscite approved the constitution and endorsed Nasser as president; according to the official count, Nasser received 99.9 percent of the votes cast. This helped set a pattern for the use of plebiscites as a substitute for elections. Yet even in the controlled setting of a plebiscite, the regime introduced new populist measures that ensured greater mass participation than had been the case previously: Men were compelled to cast ballots, and for the first time, women were permitted to vote.

By mid-1956, the Nasser regime had secured its domestic power base and attracted recognition through its land reforms. But the “revolution” of 1952 seemed stalled; it lacked a direction that might distinguish it from other military governments that had seized power throughout the developing world. A series of foreign policy triumphs would soon give the regime its distinctive character and elevate Nasser to the status of unquestioned leader of the Arab world.

FOREIGN RELATIONS AFTER 1952

Egypt, Britain, and the Suez Crisis of 1956

The most pressing foreign policy matter facing the RCC in 1952 was Egypt's vexing relationship with Britain. This relationship was all the more complex because it was closely tied to developments in the Sudan. During the monarchy's final years, the Wafd had demanded the unity of Egypt and the Sudan under the Egyptian crown. Although Britain tried to separate Egyptian issues from the question of the Sudan, Egypt insisted on linking the two. By the time the RCC rose to power, Britain had recognized that in order to clear the way for discussions on the status of the Suez Canal, it would have to settle the dispute over the Sudan. The RCC, for its part, did not give the retention of the Sudan a high priority and went so far as to drop Egypt's claims for sovereignty over that country and to demand instead the granting of Sudanese self-determination. Britain, eager to resolve its outstanding differences with Egypt, accepted the RCC's terms. The Anglo-Egyptian Agreement of February 1953 recognized the Sudan's right to self-determination and defined the steps that would achieve that goal. Two years later, the Sudanese parliament proclaimed independence, thus removing the Sudan question as an obstacle to further Anglo-Egyptian negotiations.

Those negotiations centered on Britain's future role in Egypt proper. After several months of talks, the two governments signed a treaty in 1954 providing for the evacuation of all British troops from the Suez Canal base within twenty months. Britain retained the right to reoccupy the base in the event of an attack by any outside power on an Arab League state or Turkey. The British forces were withdrawn on schedule in April 1956, and Nasser appeared to have achieved through patient diplomacy a victory that had escaped his Wafdist predecessors. Why, then, did the Suez Canal become an Anglo-Egyptian battlefield within a few months of the British evacuation?

The answer lies in the coming together of old and new patterns of Middle Eastern and Western relationships. The Suez crisis highlighted the clash between imperialism and the Arabs' desire to exercise their sovereignty, it brought out the difference between the cold war diplomacy of the Western alliance and Nasser's attempt to adopt a policy of nonalignment, and it resurrected the Arab-Israeli conflict and the unresolved issues that had festered since 1949.

As in the cases of Turkey and Iran, the United States aimed to construct an alliance system that would block Soviet expansion. Countries willing to participate in the alliance received generous US military and economic aid.

The Baghdad Pact was an attempt to extend the policy of containment to the Arab states through the use of British influence. The participants in the Baghdad Pact—Turkey, Iran, Pakistan, Iraq, and Britain—all signed an interlocking series of agreements during 1954 and 1955. Nasser refused to allow Egypt to join the pact, claiming that it was an extension of imperialism aimed to keep the Arabs in the stifling embrace of the West, and he criticized Nuri al-Sa‘id of Iraq for entering into “imperial alliances.” The Egyptian president also began a propaganda campaign to persuade other Arab states to stay clear of the Baghdad Pact. He succeeded in convincing the governments of Jordan and Syria to decline membership in the alliance.

Nasser’s defiance propelled him to regional prominence but further distanced Egypt from the Western alliance. Yet Egypt was in need of the kind of military aid the United States had showered on Turkey and Iran. Ever since the armistice agreements of 1949, the Egyptian-Israeli border had been the site of frequent hostilities. Palestinian refugees from Gaza conducted small-scale commando raids into Israeli territory. Israel responded with a policy of massive retaliation against Egyptian installations in Gaza. The scale of the Israeli incursions and the ease with which Israeli forces carried out their missions underscored their military superiority and made the Egyptians aware of the dire need to replace their outmoded equipment. However, when Nasser approached the West for arms, he was rebuffed. He therefore turned to other sources.

In September 1955, Egypt concluded an agreement with Czechoslovakia to purchase $200 million worth of advanced Soviet military equipment in exchange for Egyptian cotton. The Czech arms deal was really a Soviet-Egyptian arms deal, and it had far-reaching repercussions. With this single agreement, Nasser undermined the laboriously constructed alliance system through which the United States had tried to contain the Soviet Union. The Egyptian president had allowed the Soviet Union to hurdle the Baghdad Pact and to achieve its centuries-old ambition of acquiring a base in the eastern Mediterranean. Once again, Nasser was acclaimed in the Arab press for asserting independence from the Anglo-US grip. He was acquiring the image of a Pan-Arab leader who would not only break the Western powers’ imperial domination but also use his country’s newfound military strength to avenge the “disaster” of 1948. In Washington and London, however, the Czech arms deal provoked considerable annoyance.

Egypt's search for financial assistance to develop its agricultural base provides further background to the Suez crisis. After the coup d'état of 1952, Egyptian economic planners resurrected a long-standing scheme to construct a second dam across the Nile at Aswan. The project was viewed as having both political and economic advantages: It would be the kind of spectacular achievement that would enhance the new regime's prestige among the Egyptian population, and it would also have very real economic benefits by expanding the amount of land that could be irrigated and by providing enough hydroelectric power to supply the entire country's needs. The estimated construction costs of at least $1 billion, however, far exceeded Egypt's financial ability. The government therefore sought foreign assistance. In late 1955, the World Bank approved a loan package that involved US and British participation and, because of the irritation Nasser had caused those two countries, required Egypt to accept certain conditions. While Nasser was deciding whether to accept the arrangement, the US government, in July 1956, abruptly withdrew its loan offer.

Nasser responded with a dramatic act of defiance. On July 26, 1956, Egypt nationalized the Suez Canal, and Nasser proclaimed that he would use the revenues from the canal to fund the development projects the West refused to sponsor. Egypt and the Arab world at large greeted Nasser's bold action with tremendous enthusiasm. The Suez Canal, built with Egyptian labor but operated by a French company and used as the lifeline of the British Empire, had stood as a symbol of Western exploitation. In seizing it for Egypt, Nasser was seen to have overturned his nation's forced subordination to outside interests.

The reaction in Western capitals was one of extreme hostility. Prime Minister Anthony Eden of Britain regarded Nasser's nationalization of the canal as theft and spoke in ominous terms about teaching the Egyptian president a lesson. Throughout late summer 1956, special international conferences sought a resolution of the matter. Although Nasser offered to pay compensation to the Suez Canal Company, he refused to compromise on the Egyptianization of the canal. His position was strengthened by the ability of Egyptian technicians to keep the waterway operating smoothly, something Britain had claimed would be impossible.

While efforts to reach a negotiated settlement of the crisis were under way, Britain, France, and Israel concluded a secret agreement for joint military action against Egypt. Each country had its own reasons for approving the action, but they all shared a common desire to overthrow Nasser. Their agreement was activated on October 29, 1956, with an Israeli strike into Sinai. On October 31, the British air force began heavy bombing raids on military targets near Cairo and along the canal zone, and Israeli ground forces raced to the east bank of the canal. British and French paratroops dropped on Port Sa‘id on November 5, and on the following day, the main Anglo-French force landed at the canal’s northern end and advanced on Suez City. The advance was halted when, at midnight on November 6, Britain and France agreed to a UN-sponsored cease-fire.

Both the United States and the Soviet Union condemned the tripartite attack on Egypt. The latter, in the process of crushing an uprising in Hungary, issued a thinly veiled threat to launch a rocket attack on London if Britain did not withdraw troops from Egypt. The US government was particularly upset at the action of three of its close allies and took the position that none of them could be allowed to benefit from the use of force. Under extreme US pressure, Britain and France withdrew their forces in December, and the Israelis evacuated Sinai in March 1957. A special UN emergency force was stationed in Gaza to act as a buffer between Egypt and Israel.

The Suez crisis had momentous consequences for all the parties involved. Egypt's military defeat was transformed into a political triumph for Nasser. Instead of being overthrown, he emerged from the crisis as an Egyptian and Pan-Arab hero. He had stood up to the two former imperial powers and faced them down, the United States and the Soviet Union had defended Egypt's sovereignty, and Egypt ultimately retained possession of the Suez Canal. Soviet prestige among the Arabs was also enhanced during the crisis and continued to grow when the Soviets replenished Egypt's battered arsenal. The collusion among the three aggressors reinforced their negative images within the Arab world. If Israel had once again demonstrated the effectiveness of its armed forces, its attack on Egypt confirmed Arab opinion that the country was an agent of the Western powers. As for Britain and France, their decision to ally with Israel in an attack on an Arab state was viewed as a monstrous offense. It had unfortunate repercussions within Egypt; many British and French nationals who had spent their entire lives in the country were expelled and their property seized. Several thousand Egyptian Jews were also expelled or decided to leave because of the strong anti-Jewish sentiment aroused by the Israeli invasion. Of the three invading states, Britain was most severely damaged by its role in the Suez affair. Not only had Britain resorted to the heavy-handed imperialist tactics of earlier years, but it had been forced to abandon its military operation by pressure from two demonstrably stronger superpowers. The epitaph for Britain at Suez was provided in the London Times' description of the effect of Prime Minister Eden's decision to invade Egypt: He was "the last British Prime Minister to believe that Britain was a Great Power and the first to confront a crisis which proved beyond doubt that she was not."²

Egypt and the Arab World: The United Arab Republic

In his book Philosophy of the Revolution, published in 1955, Nasser wrote,

The pages of history are full of heroes who created for themselves roles of glorious valor which they played at decisive moments. Likewise the pages of history are also full of heroic and glorious roles which never found heroes to perform them. For some reason it seems to me that within the Arab circle there is a role, wandering aimlessly in search of a hero. And I do not know why it seems to me that this role, exhausted by its wanderings, has at last settled down, tired and weary, near the borders of our country and is beckoning to us to move, to take up its lines, to put on its costume, since no one else is qualified to play it.³

As a result of his triumph in the aftermath of the Suez crisis, Nasser stepped into the heroic role he had defined. No other Arab leader approached his status, and no other Arab leader aroused such high expectations. This was a burden as well as an opportunity. Nasser's prestige was based on his successful defiance of the former imperial powers. But to retain that prestige, he needed to continue his foreign policy successes and to fulfill the hopes that millions of Arabs outside Egypt placed in him. Nasser responded to the challenge by thrusting Egypt into the turbulent crosscurrents of inter-Arab politics. The impact of Nasserism on the other Arab states is discussed in Chapter 16. The focus here is on Egypt itself.

Although Egypt's Arab heritage was an undeniable reality, prominent writers of the interwar era downplayed that heritage by emphasizing the country's Greek and pharaonic past in an effort to connect it more closely with secular Western culture. Nasser's desire to make Egypt the center of Arabism therefore required some cultural reorientation. In place of the multilayered strands of identity posited by pre-1952 intellectuals, the Nasser regime devoted a single-minded emphasis to Arabism and Pan-Arab unity. For example, the 1956 constitution stated that Egypt was an Arab country and a part of the Arab nation. No such declaration had appeared in the 1923 constitution. Nasser's popularity, his endorsement of the concept of Arab unity, and his support for other Arab concerns served to establish Egypt's Arab identity and to place it at the forefront of the Pan-Arab movement. In pursuit of the twin goals of Arab unity and Egyptian hegemony, Nasser interfered in the political affairs of other Arab countries. His involvement in foreign policy ventures following the Suez crisis earned him further esteem but diverted his government's attention from urgent domestic problems.

The creation of the United Arab Republic (UAR) in early 1958 appeared to be a major step along the road to Arab unity. The UAR was a total union of Syria and Egypt into a single state. The impetus for the union came from a group of Syrian politicians who were members of the dominant Ba'th Party (see Chapter 16). They feared that a small but well-organized Communist movement within Syria was on the verge of overthrowing their government. They therefore approached Nasser about forming a Syrian-Egyptian union, thinking it would forestall the Communist takeover and preserve their own dominance. Nasser accepted the proposal, and less than a month later, the UAR was announced and Nasser was received by cheering throngs in Damascus.

Despite the acclaim it received when it was created, the UAR was an awkward entity. It had been brought hurriedly into existence by an internal Syrian political problem and by Nasser's acceptance of an offer he simply could not refuse. Its architects intended the new state to be an integral union between the two participants, but Egypt quickly became dominant. The Syrian leaders who had requested the merger found themselves forced to live in Cairo, from where they exercised little influence on events in their homeland. Nasser, who became president of the UAR, imposed on Syria the single-party military regime that had worked so well in Egypt. Egyptian military and civilian personnel streamed into Syria, replacing their Syrian counterparts in important functions and behaving with a high-handed arrogance that infuriated the Syrians. One Syrian general later complained that "every Egyptian officer in Syria during the union acted as if he were Gamal Abdel Nasser."⁴ The abolition of Syrian political parties, the dismissal of Syrian officers, and the forced introduction of a modified version of the Egyptian land reform laws alienated powerful sectors within Syrian society. In September 1961, units within the Syrian military rebelled against their Egyptian commanders and brought an end to the UAR and to the first self-conscious experiment in Arab unity.

The UAR's breakup tarnished Nasser's prestige and prompted him to reappraise his goals. After 1961, the regime turned inward and introduced a new round of domestic reforms. However, Nasser did not abandon his role as champion of Arab unity and did not hesitate to intervene in the affairs of other Arab states when it served his purposes. This was shown, with disastrous consequences, by Egypt's participation on the rebel side in the Yemen civil war. In 1962, the military ousted the ruler of Yemen and declared a republic. However, the ruler, Imam Muhammad al-Badr, escaped to the mountains and rallied loyal tribesmen to his cause, launching an armed struggle to regain his throne. Imam Muhammad received generous assistance from two other monarchs, the kings of Jordan and Saudi Arabia. It was only natural that the new military regime, under the leadership of Abdallah al-Sallal, would turn to Nasser for assistance and that he, as the announced foe of the old order, would respond favorably. By 1965, nearly 70,000 Egyptian troops were fighting on the side of the military regime in Yemen. Bogged down in difficult terrain and harassed by guerrillas, the Egyptian forces suffered heavy losses and were finally withdrawn in 1968. In this case, Egypt's intervention divided Arab loyalties instead of unifying them; it presented the spectacle of Arab fighting Arab and of the heads of state of Saudi Arabia and Egypt hurling insults at each other.

Egypt asserted its leadership of the Pan-Arab movement in other, more subtle ways. Radio Cairo's Voice of the Arabs beamed propaganda broadcasts the length and breadth of the Arab world and beyond. The Egyptian movie industry was the largest in the Arab Middle East and produced films seen throughout the region. And the era's most popular Arab singer, Umm Kalthum, was an Egyptian woman who packed concert halls and enthralled radio audiences in every Arab country. Nasser and Egypt were, it seemed, constantly in the public eye, and much was expected of them both.

Egypt, the Soviet Union, and the United States

Egyptian-Soviet ties were strengthened after Suez. In 1958, the Soviet Union agreed to finance the Aswan Dam project as well as to provide Egypt with increased military and technical assistance. Egypt became increasingly dependent on Moscow for weapons and spare parts. Whereas Muhammad Ali in the 1820s had sent future members of the Egyptian elite to France for training, Nasser in the 1960s sent future flight commanders and civilian technocrats to Soviet universities. Yet the Soviet-Egyptian relationship had its troubled periods, usually brought on by ideological differences. The scientific socialism and atheism of the Soviet Union contrasted sharply with the nationalistic, Islamic foundations of Egypt. However, Nasser and his Soviet counterparts were pragmatic men who recognized that they needed one another: Nasser received from the Soviets the weapons that gave credibility to Egypt's leadership role, and the Soviets obtained in Egypt a center of influence in the Middle East from which they contested US efforts to contain them.

Soviet-US rivalry in the Middle East was a constant factor in the evolution of Egyptian foreign policy. In the aftermath of the Suez crisis, the United States formulated a new policy to deal with its concerns over the Soviet threat in the region. Known as the Eisenhower Doctrine (1957), the policy contained promises of economic and military assistance to countries resisting communism. In addition, the doctrine authorized the deployment of US forces to protect the independence of Middle Eastern states threatened by armed aggression from any nation controlled by international communism.

To Nasser, this smacked of the same kind of Western control embodied in the Baghdad Pact, and he viewed the Eisenhower Doctrine with suspicion. Nevertheless, even as Egypt became more reliant on Soviet military assistance, Nasser kept open his country's ties to the United States. He defined Egypt's foreign policy as positive neutralism. It was a self-interested strategy by which Egypt could acquire benefits from both superpowers at the same time while avoiding total reliance on either of them. US assistance was sporadic and amounted mainly to permitting Egypt to purchase US wheat with Egyptian currency. Two principal factors impeded the improvement of US-Egyptian relations: The first was Nasser's refusal to commit Egypt to the Western alliance and his acceptance of Soviet military aid; the second was the United States' unwavering support for Israel at a time when Nasser was the champion of the Arab cause against Israel.

THE ADOPTION OF ARAB SOCIALISM

As we have seen, the Free Officers seized power without a predetermined ideology. From 1952 to 1961, the regime acquired legitimacy through its foreign policy ventures and Nasser's immense popularity. But the regime did not establish a set of guiding principles that might have inspired popular commitment. So, following the UAR's breakup in 1961, Nasser and his associates reassessed their domestic policies and concluded that Egypt's successful economic development required the adoption of selected elements of socialism. They called their version of the ideology Arab socialism in an attempt to show that it had indigenous roots. Arab socialism became the regime's rallying cry, the doctrine intended to attract a new generation of Egyptians to the achievement of revolutionary goals.

The government adopted socialism for pragmatic reasons, not out of any long-standing ideological commitment. Indeed, during the regime's early years, it offered incentives to foreign and local private investors. However, Nasser's Egypt was not an enticing haven for surplus investment capital, and the regime had difficulty raising funds. Therefore, to generate the funds needed for its development schemes, the government decided to take over most of Egypt's enterprises and to become responsible for all capital formation. In this sense, the regime's economic policy was more a form of state capitalism than Marxist socialism; it was based on the need to raise money, not on the dynamic of class conflict.

The most concentrated outflow of socialist decrees occurred from 1961 to 1964 with the nationalization of the remaining foreign-owned companies as well as all domestic enterprises, from banks to insurance companies, from import agencies to hotels. Even the media were brought under state control, and Egypt's once-lively press became a possession of the central government and was subject to rigorous censorship. Newly formed planning agencies managed the economy, and in 1960, Egypt announced its first five-year plan, which heavily emphasized industrial development. During the 1960s, industrial output increased substantially, especially the production of textiles, food, and beverages. Nevertheless, the regime's fascination with grand showcase projects, most notably the iron and steel plant at Helwan, translated into astronomical expenditures for modest returns. An additional barrier to industrial expansion lay in the very nature of state-run industries: They were subjected to rigid central-planning mechanisms, they were overstaffed at the managerial level, and they lacked incentive for quality control because they had no competition. The regime also spent lavish sums on various land reclamation schemes, none of which proved very successful. However, the completion of the Aswan Dam in 1970 allowed 650,000 feddans to be reclaimed as agricultural land, albeit with a host of negative ecological side effects.

Any improvement in the overall Egyptian economy demanded government measures to limit the country's soaring birthrate. Although the 1962 charter (discussed in the following section) made reference to family planning, the government did not pursue the matter systematically. As a result, Egypt's population continued to grow at the rate of 2.5 percent a year. In 1960, there were 26 million Egyptians; in 1980, the figure had risen to over 40 million. Overpopulation was and remains one of Egypt's gravest problems.⁵ During the Nasser years, the basic consumption demands of an ever-expanding population changed Egypt from a net exporter of foodstuffs to a heavy importer. This situation worsened as the increase in population far outstripped the reclamation of new agricultural land. And for every feddan laboriously reclaimed from the desert, valuable chunks of rich soil along the Nile were absorbed by relentless urban expansion.

In taking over all the country's enterprises, the government created an enormous personnel problem for itself. The state now had to manage and staff the entire range of businesses and industries that had formerly been in private hands. In keeping with its military origins, the regime relied heavily on former officers to direct the various ministries and development agencies. This had the advantage of providing perquisites to the officer corps and cultivating its loyalty; it had the disadvantage of placing individuals in charge of operations for which they were untrained.

Nasser's socialism also involved far-reaching measures of egalitarianism and social welfare. In 1961, the allowable landholdings per family were reduced to 100 feddans, and in 1969, to 50 feddans. The total land reform program, beginning with the Agrarian Reform Law of 1952, affected only 12 percent of the cultivated area and provided a mere 9 percent of the rural population with land. Nevertheless, the regime's programs created a breathtaking leveling in the distribution of landholdings.

Large estates virtually disappeared, and by 1964, small farms (less than 5 feddans) covered 55 percent of the cultivated area, medium farms (5 to 50 feddans) made up 33 percent, and the remaining 12 percent were between 50 and 100 feddans.⁶ And the government achieved this more equitable distribution without major production disruptions—crop yields did not decline and, in some years, actually increased. Land reform did not eliminate landlessness or rural poverty, but it did enhance the economic and social standing of middle-level peasants, perhaps the main beneficiaries of the regime's agrarian policies.

Other measures of social equity were enacted after 1961. Laws on income distribution struck at the wealthy by limiting individual salaries to a maximum of £E5,000 and by stipulating that incomes over £E10,000 would be taxed at the rate of 90 percent. These measures succeeded in further reducing the power of the old elite. At the other end of the social scale, the state introduced measures that provided civil servants and workers with pensions, minimum wages, and health care.

Institutionalizing Socialism: The Charter and the Constitution

In 1962, Nasser presented to a specially convened congress the Charter for National Action, a document that explained and justified Egypt's new policies. The charter was an attempt to provide ideological foundations for the regime's actions and to create mass identification with the new measures. It proclaimed that Egypt was in the midst of a revolution to achieve freedom, socialism, and unity. The document asserted Egypt's preeminence in Arab affairs by portraying the country as the vanguard of the Arab revolution. According to the charter, it was Egypt's duty to export its revolution to other Arab countries, a process that would eliminate the reactionary elements within the Arab body politic and pave the way to a durable Arab union. Such statements were hardly welcome to the reigning Arab monarchs.

The instrument through which the goals of the revolution were to be attained was the Arab Socialist Union (ASU), another mass-based single party. The charter defined the ASU as a revolutionary organization open to all Egyptians except feudalists and capitalists. By the late 1960s, the ASU had ballooned into a complex bureaucratic organization of some 5 million members working through local, regional, and national branches. Nasser headed the ASU, and former military officers filled the top administrative levels. The ASU was essentially an arm of the government used to mobilize mass opinion, to train cadres of young Egyptians, and to prevent the formation of antirevolutionary centers. Although the ASU had more success than its two predecessors (the Liberation Rally and the National Union), it too became cumbersome, patronage ridden, and an object of resentment.

The state's political structure was once again redefined in a new constitution, proclaimed in 1964. It did contain some new provisions—such as the requirement that 50 percent of the delegates to the national assembly had to be workers and peasants—but essentially reinforced Nasser's preference for a strong presidential system of government. Despite the trappings of democracy, the national assembly was little more than a consultative body that rubber-stamped legislation originating with the president. Nasser was confirmed in office by another plebiscite held in 1965.

Nasser disliked sharing power, and his presidency was marked by the centralization of decision-making authority in his hands. Institutions mattered little as long as all major issues were referred to Nasser and as long as his decisions became policy. Scholars have described the regime in terms ranging from “guided democracy” to “soft-hearted authoritarianism.”⁷ If the base of popular participation in political life was broadened, the regime made sure that the popular will was controlled from above. Thus, in 1966, the secretary general of the ASU stated that Egypt's political structure was organized to provide “the proper guidance for the masses.” But as others have pointed out, it is a short step from the concept of proper guidance to the establishment of a police state that enforces conformity.⁸ Nasser's Egypt had its secret police, its spies within the ASU, and its political prisoners. But it lacked the oppressiveness and brutality of the shah of Iran's regime. Egyptians always believed that Nasser—if not always his associates—had their interests at heart, and accordingly, they were willing to grant him immense powers.

The Revolution and Society

The egalitarianism of the Nasser regime extended, in theory, to gender relationships. The charter of 1962 stated that women were equal to men, and other decrees gave women the right to vote and to serve in the national assembly. Moreover, the nationalization of the economy created large numbers of public-sector jobs, many of which were filled by women. As women entered the workplace and universities in ever-greater numbers, they tended to abandon the veil and to adopt contemporary international dress. However, the changes in appearance were not always reflected in matters of substance. For all the rhetoric about equality, the Nasser regime was exceptionally cautious in its attitude toward family law and did not introduce reformist legislation on such matters as polygamy and divorce.

Like other modernizing regimes, the Nasser government devoted considerable attention to expanding education. At the primary and secondary levels, the government's goal was not only to boost the literacy rate but also to give schoolchildren a proper indoctrination in the basics of socialism and nationalism. The advances in education were impressive numerically: Enrollment in primary schools went up from 1.3 million in 1953 to 3.6 million in 1970. But the enrollment increases exceeded the government's ability to build schools or train instructors and led to overcrowded classrooms and unfavorable student-teacher ratios. And even with all the effort devoted to education, roughly 60 percent of adult Egyptians remained illiterate in 1969.

To encourage students to attend university—and thus to acquire the skills needed to manage a nationalized economy—the state abolished tuition fees at post-secondary institutions and opened several new universities in the provincial capitals. Nasser's famous proclamation of 1962 guaranteeing a government job to every university graduate provided a further incentive for university education. Young Egyptians responded to these opportunities, and the number of university students nearly doubled during the 1960s. But the university system was ill equipped to deal with the influx: Classrooms were packed with students, and teachers, books, and laboratory equipment were in short supply. These conditions led to a swelling of discontent on the campuses.

In opening up university access, the regime hoped to draw students into scientific and technical fields, the areas in which the state faced the greatest personnel shortages. Throughout the 1960s, however, the majority of students enrolled in arts, law, and commerce, the fields with the most limited employment opportunities. Once they graduated, these students had little choice but to take up Nasser's guarantee of a job in the expanding state bureaucracy. Such posts were low paying and offered few rewards other than security. For those whose expectations had been raised by earning a university degree, the lack of adequate employment opportunities was a blow to their self-esteem. Such discontent contributed to growing frustration and restlessness on the part of Egyptian university students.

Some observers have compared Nasser to Atatürk. To the extent that both men were reformers determined to free their countries from foreign domination, the comparison is apt. However, the Egyptian regime's relationship with Islam and the religious establishment was very different from Atatürk's. Rather than seeking to diminish Islam's role in Egyptian society, Nasser recognized the appeal of Islamic institutions and attempted to bring them under state control and then to use them in the service of the revolution. This objective is evident in the regime's policies toward al-Azhar University, the venerable institution of Islamic learning and the principal training ground for the Egyptian ulama. Previous governments had either bypassed al-Azhar and its powerful ulama or attempted to dominate them. The Nasser government had recourse to direct action. In 1961, al-Azhar was reorganized by government decree and forced to accept the addition of four new, nonreligious faculties: medicine, engineering, agriculture, and an Islamic women's faculty. The reorganization effectively reduced the authority of the rector of al-Azhar and gave the government control over the university's curriculum and the appointment of its administrators and teachers. The government also gained control of waqfs and destroyed the last bastion of the ulama's judicial power by abolishing the shari'ah courts in 1955. Through these measures, the regime tried to prevent Islamic functionaries from acting as an independent political force without itself appearing to be an opponent of Islam.

The regime did not hesitate to utilize Islamic institutions to legitimize its policies. Government propagandists prepared the Friday mosque sermons, and they contained glowing references to the compatibility of the government's goals with Islamic principles. Following the nationalization decrees of 1961, prominent government-appointed ulama were persuaded to issue decrees and write articles on the harmony between Islam and Arab socialism. Thus, a book published in 1962 on the compatibility of religion and the charter affirmed that "Arab socialism is guided by the Shari'ah of justice and the Shari'ah of god."⁹ Such exploitation of Islam for political purposes illustrates how far removed the Nasser regime was from the secularism of Atatürk.

CONCLUSION

The Nasser years in Egypt are associated with a number of significant events and policies: the Czech arms agreement, the Suez crisis, the United Arab Republic, the proclamation of Arab socialism, and the adoption of agrarian reform, to name a few. However, the sentiment associated with the Nasser phenomenon cannot be fully explained by a list of social reforms or foreign policy ventures. Nasserism was a feeling, a sense of excitement, a hope for a new Arab future. To be sure, it was clear to many that Egypt's bureaucracy was inflated, that its state-run industries were inefficient, and that its educational system was overcrowded. But despite these and other widely recognized shortcomings, Egypt and its dynamic president appeared to have set in motion a positive process of national transformation. Decisive action had cast aside the oppressive past, and Egypt had gained a measure of independence and pride that at the time seemed enviable and worthy of emulation.

Still, the leadership role that had given Nasser his stature proved a burden as well as a blessing. To retain his—and Egypt's—leading place in the Arab movement, he had to renew his image from time to time. In spring 1967, he was presented with an opportunity to stand up to Israel and to bring the other Arab states in line with Egypt's position. Nasser seized the opportunity, and (as we will see in the next chapter) in so doing, he exposed his country to a humiliating military defeat that called into question all he appeared to have achieved.

CHAPTER 16

THE MIDDLE EAST IN THE AGE OF NASSER

The Radicalization of Arab Politics

The current of discontent that brought an end to the old regime in Egypt also pulsed through other Arab states. Throughout the 1950s, a wave of coups and countercoups swept the eastern Arab world as a new generation of impatient military officers tried to construct a new order. But none had the combination of personal skills, good fortune, and popular support that stoked Nasser's rise to power. In particular, they proved unable to prevent the division of their armed forces into competing political factions. This politicization of the military led to governmental instability and hampered the new rulers' efforts to implement reform.

As regimes rose and fell, Nasser continued his attempts to form a Pan-Arab union under Egyptian control. However, the young military officers of Syria and Iraq, although they admired Nasser and shared many of his goals, did not wish to be dominated by him. The pro-Western governments in Lebanon and Jordan also resisted the call to Arab unity, but in so doing, they opened themselves to subversion by Nasserite supporters. The late 1950s and early 1960s were years of intense inter-Arab rivalry and have aptly been called the period of the Arab cold war. In studying this period, we should keep in mind the other cold war between the United States and the Soviet Union that influenced and was influenced by developments in the core eastern Arab states.

SYRIA: THE MILITARY IN POLITICS

Syria entered the postwar years with uncontested parliamentary institutions and a political leadership unfamiliar with the tasks of governing. These impediments to a healthy political life were compounded by the legacy of French mandate policies that stressed regional and confessional divisions. The first elected president of independent Syria, Shukri al-Quwwatli (see Chapter 12), added to the burdens of his office by committing the inexperienced Syrian armed forces to war against Israel in 1948. The patriotic officer corps blamed Syria's defeat on the corrupt civilian regime.

In March 1949, the army took matters into its own hands by staging the first of what would be a series of military coups. Led by Colonel Husni Za'im, the coup ousted President Quwwatli and terminated the political domination of the urban notable classes. The wealthy urban politicians who had been educated in Ottoman or European schools were replaced by young men of mainly peasant origins trained in the Syrian military academy. Za'im's seizure of power ushered in a period of extreme political instability marked by two additional coups before the year ended. The second of these coups was led by Colonel Adib Shishakli, who managed to hang onto power until 1954.

Shishakli established a centralized military dictatorship and temporarily ended the factionalism in the officer corps. In his first two years, the order and discipline he imposed on Syrian political life were not unpopular. Shishakli predated Nasser in adopting a neutralist foreign policy and refusing to participate in Western-sponsored defense pacts. His regional policy emphasized Syria's Arabism and rested on the assumption that Syria would be the core of any future Pan-Arab union. Shishakli's popularity declined when, like all dictators, he resorted to repressive measures to retain power. Amid widespread disaffection with his regime, a faction within the military ousted Shishakli in 1954.

Although Syria returned to civilian parliamentary government, the military continued to interfere in politics. From 1954 until the merger with Egypt in 1958, the Syrian political structure was so fragmented that government could barely function. Syria's political instability can be traced to several factors. First, the divide-and-rule policies of the French had encouraged Syrians to identify with their regional, religious, or ethnic community at the expense of loyalties to the Syrian nation as a whole. After independence, individuals tended to retain their communal loyalties, even when they were members of such national institutions as the armed forces and civil service. A second source of instability was the factionalization and politicization of the officer corps. Husni Za‘im’s coup of 1949 weakened the old order and made the military the country’s paramount political force. However, unlike Egypt’s Free Officers, the Syrian military did not produce a figure who was able to secure the loyalty of the entire armed forces for a sustained period. Factions within the military continuously maneuvered against whatever officer had most recently seized power and thus prevented the consolidation of a strong military regime.

The emergence of political parties also contributed to the factionalization of Syrian political life. The urban notables, with their shifting alliances and informal agreements among prominent individuals, were replaced by broadly based parties committed to specific programs and ideologies. During the mid-1950s, the Syrian Communist Party, though not large, became a major political force as it attracted a following among military officers and minority groups. Party leader Khalid Bakdash was a skillful organizer and orator. When elected to parliament in 1954, he became the first Communist Party deputy in the Arab world. The Ba‘th Party also demonstrated its strength in the 1954 elections. It was to develop as the most significant ideological Arab party of the postwar era and exercised an influence on Nasser and other key figures outside Syria.

The Ba‘th (literally, resurrection) was founded by Michel Aflaq (b. 1912), an Orthodox Christian, and Salah al-Din al-Bitar (b. 1911), a Sunni Muslim. During their student days in Paris in the early 1930s, the two formulated a doctrine combining aspects of nationalism and socialism. Upon returning to Syria, they spent several years as teachers in Damascus secondary schools and gained a loyal following among students. The Ba‘th became a formal party at the time of Syrian independence in 1946. As defined in the writings of Aflaq, who served as the party’s ideologue, the Ba‘th was dedicated to revolutionary activism aimed at completely transforming Arab society. At the heart of the party’s platform was a belief in the existence of a single Arab nation and a commitment to achieving Arab unity. From unity would come the restoration of Arab dignity and the reemergence of Arab virtues. Although a Christian, Aflaq made Islam an integral part of Ba‘thist ideology. He equated Islam and Arabism, both of which he saw as expressions of the Arab spirit.

In Aflaq’s writings, the Ba‘th was given a revolutionary mission to end social injustice, class exploitation, and tyranny and to establish freedom, democracy, and socialism. Aflaq argued that if independence from imperial control was to be worthwhile, it had to be accompanied by attitudinal change and social reform; it had to involve a national resurrection. Such a resurrection would come only through a social revolution. With its socialist vision, its call for Arab unity, and its compelling appeal to all Arabs to dedicate themselves to a national rebirth, the Ba‘th attracted a following among young Arabs that extended beyond Syrian borders. Nasser later transposed the party’s slogan of unity, freedom, and socialism to the Egyptian arena.

Syrian political instability also sprang from the country’s place in the struggle for domination of the eastern Arab world. In the mid-1950s, Egypt and Iraq were the main rivals for Arab supremacy. Iraq, under its Hashimite monarchy, represented a conservative, pro-Western orientation, whereas Nasser’s Egypt stood for reform and independence from Great Power alliances. Each of these states sought to bring Syria into its orbit and thereby boost its own regional power. Syrian politicians and military officers disagreed over which of the two states would make the best ally, and this division—which Egypt and Iraq happily exploited—contributed to the country’s political turmoil.

In late 1957, the Syrian Ba‘thist leaders, recognizing their inability to bring the country under their control and fearing that continued chaos would benefit the Communists, approached Nasser about a union. They hoped that as a fellow reformer, Nasser would use his influence to keep them in power. The United Arab Republic was proclaimed in February 1958 but, as we saw in Chapter 15, was so dominated by Egypt that the Ba‘thists played little part in its governance, and the union broke up in 1961. Although the UAR had collapsed, in 1958, its creation was regarded as a significant and dramatic development. The combination of Ba‘thist ideology and Nasser’s leadership seemed to have the possibility of attracting other Arab states to the union and of achieving the Arab rebirth Aflaq’s writings had so eloquently portrayed. For these reasons, the proclamation of the UAR elicited a widespread reaction among Arab activists and conservatives alike.

IRAQ: THE END OF THE MONARCHY

From the end of World War II to 1958, Iraq remained firmly under the control of the Hashimite monarchy and its agents. King Faysal II came of age in 1953, but the power behind the throne was still Prince Abd al-Ilah, the regent since 1939. Outside the palace, Nuri al-Sa‘id, after three decades at the center of power, kept a tight rein on the political process and directed Iraq’s foreign policy. The pro-Western, pro-British orientation of this policy was symbolized by Iraq’s signing of the Baghdad Pact in 1955.

The complex composition of the Iraqi population (discussed in Chapter 11) continued to impact the country’s political development and its relations with other Arab states. The majority Shi‘a community, underrepresented in the political system, resented the concentration of political power and economic benefits in the hands of the Sunnis. The Shi‘as generally opposed Pan-Arabism, knowing that in any Arab federation, they would become a marginalized minority. Iraq’s most volatile minority group was the predominantly Sunni Kurdish community. Perpetually struggling for political and cultural autonomy, the Kurds opposed Pan-Arabism and warned that if Iraq entered an Arab union, they would demand an independent Kurdish state. To these tensions were added the disparities in the ways of life between urban and rural inhabitants, between tribes and sedentary peasants, and between the wealthy landowners and the impoverished peasant masses. In the late 1950s, about 80 percent of Iraq’s population remained rural and lived in abysmal conditions. As many as 90 percent of the peasants toiled as sharecropping tenants whose relationships with their landlords were of a feudal nature. Individual landholdings were not as large as in Egypt, but the patterns of uneven distribution were similar, with less than 1 percent of all landholders controlling over 55 percent of all privately owned land in 1958.

The postwar Iraqi governments had such a narrow base of support that they were unwilling to address questions of social reform for fear that any alteration of the status quo would alienate the landowners and other groups on whose support the regime's continued existence depended. Nuri al-Sa‘id kept political participation confined to a small group of loyalists, a practice that alienated the rising generation of reform-minded nationalists attracted to Nasserism. The regime's stagnation, its pro-British alliance, and its anti-Nasser propaganda were so at odds with prevailing opinion that it could sustain itself only through police repression and censorship, and even those tactics proved insufficient. In July 1958, Brigadier Abd al-Karim Qasim overthrew the regime in a bloody military coup in which scores of people were killed, including King Faysal II, Prince Abd al-Ilah, and Nuri al-Sa‘id. The British-installed Hashimite monarchy, a pillar of the Western alliance system, was terminated after thirty-seven years of existence.

Qasim's coup sent shock waves throughout the eastern Arab world. It ushered in a decade of unstable military rule during which Iraq joined Egypt and Syria in proclaiming revolution at home and neutrality abroad. Qasim established a personal military dictatorship that lasted until 1963, when it was toppled by dissident factions within the military led by Colonel Abd al-Salam Arif, who assumed the title of president. Arif's death in a plane crash in 1966 ended his short rule; he was succeeded by his brother and fellow military officer, Abd al-Rahman Arif, who held power until 1968.

The successive military regimes announced expansive domestic reforms, but the political situation was so uncertain and the effort required to hang on to power so demanding that the rulers had little opportunity to implement their reformist decrees. Qasim proclaimed Iraq to be a republic, but it was a “republic” in which he and his successors banned elections. In Iraq, as in Syria, the demise of the old political order was quickly followed by the emergence of ideological parties, the largest and best organized of which was the Communist Party. Its main rival was the Ba‘th, an offshoot of the parent party in Syria, which attracted Pan-Arab nationalists eager to have Iraq merge with the UAR. Qasim at first used Communist support to counterbalance the Pan-Arab nationalists; then, when it appeared that the Communists were about to take over the state, he turned against them, and by 1960, he was well on his way to creating a personal dictatorship.

Once Qasim overthrew the monarchy, he still had to confront the large landowners who had been among the main supporters and beneficiaries of Hashimite rule. Early in his regime, Qasim issued an agrarian reform law based on the 1952 Egyptian model and intended to serve the same purposes as the Egyptian law—namely, to reduce the wealth and power of the landed elite while improving the living conditions of the peasantry. The Iraqi law allowed individual proprietors to retain up to 620 acres (251 ha) of irrigated land and authorized the state to seize the excess and redistribute it to tenants in lots ranging from 20 to 75 acres (8 to 30 ha), depending on the quality of the land. In the absence of trained personnel and adequate surveys, the law was difficult to implement, and by the end of Qasim's regime, the state had distributed only one-third of the acreage it had seized, making the law more a weapon against large proprietors than a means of creating a new class of landowning peasants.¹

In foreign policy, Qasim withdrew Iraq from the Baghdad Pact and forged close bonds with the Soviet Union and the Eastern bloc states. Shortly after the coup, Iraq and the USSR reached an agreement providing for Soviet military and economic assistance. With the signing of this accord, the US policy of containment appeared to be in disarray; within just a few years, the three most powerful Arab states, Egypt, Syria, and Iraq, had rejected the idea of exclusive participation in the Western alliance and opened themselves to Soviet influence. The Baghdad Pact was without the country that claimed Baghdad as its capital. Although the three states declared their neutrality in the superpower conflict, they relied on the Soviet Union for their weapons, a relationship that contained the potential for economic and diplomatic dependency.

As for the all-important question of Iraq's role in the Arab world, the regimes of Qasim and the Arif brothers failed to reach a solution acceptable to all the country's political factions. Qasim faced conflicting domestic pressures from two opposing forces: the Pan-Arab nationalists, who demanded an immediate merger with the UAR, and the Communists, who, aware of Nasser's suppression of the Egyptian Communist Party, opposed joining the UAR and advocated instead a sovereign Iraq. Although Qasim proclaimed his support for Arab solidarity, he had no desire to become subordinate to Nasser the way the Syrians had. He therefore chose to retain Iraq's independent status. This decision produced a rupture with the Nasser regime, which had staked so much on the achievement of Pan-Arab unity. In the final years of Qasim's rule, Iraq and Egypt, two reformist states that shared many of the same goals, again became regional rivals hurling insults at one another through the media.

Despite Qasim's refusal to join the UAR, the Pan-Arab dynamic persisted in Iraqi politics, as illustrated by the policies of Qasim's successor, Abd al-Salam Arif. Arif participated in a series of summit talks with the Egyptian president, and in 1964, the two countries prepared plans to integrate their military and economic policies with the intention of achieving full union in 1966. To bring Iraq's economic structure into alignment with Egypt's, Arif nationalized all banks and insurance companies as well as several large manufacturing firms. However, even as Arif cooperated with Egypt, he had to placate other factions of officers who opposed unification. He proceeded with such caution that by the time of his death in 1966, little real progress had been made toward the full integration of Iraq and Egypt. Arab unity remained an elusive dream, battered by the crosscurrents of political instability, ethnic discord, and personal ambition.

The experiences of the military regimes of Qasim and the Arif brothers revealed the difficulties of establishing reformist governments in Iraq. Not only were the officer corps factionalized and the civilian politicians divided, but Iraqi society as a whole was riddled with so many religious, ethnic, and economic interest groups that mobilization of the population behind a common goal proved impossible. Any program the government announced, whether it was unity with Egypt or agrarian reform, was bound to elicit opposition from one or another of the interest groups. Qasim endeavored to establish a regime based on loyalty to the personality of the ruler, but this strategy alienated the military, which then overthrew him. Arif's use of Pan-Arabism as the doctrine around which to build loyalty to the regime was as divisive as it was cohesive.

The hostility between the government and the Kurds has featured strongly in Iraqi history, and like the question of Pan-Arabism, it has markedly influenced the rise and fall of the postwar governments. As noted in Chapter 11, the Kurds possess a distinct ethnic and cultural identity centered on the Kurdish language. In their resistance to full integration into Iraq, the Kurds have variously demanded cultural autonomy and complete independence. They have attracted so much attention from Iraqi regimes over the years because of their numbers (20 to 25 percent of the country's population) and their concentration around the north's rich oil fields. In 1958, Qasim took steps to gain Kurdish support for his new regime by permitting Iraqi Kurd leader Mustafa al-Barzani to return from a long exile in the Soviet Union and by publicly guaranteeing Kurdish national rights. Once it became evident to Barzani that the government could not implement its promises, he organized a full-scale Kurdish rebellion against the regime. The conflict raged from 1961 to 1963, with neither side able to secure its objectives. Determined Kurdish fighters blocked the Iraqi army from penetrating their mountain strongholds, but they could not persuade the government to grant their demands. For its part, the Qasim regime struck hard at the rebels, but even its bombing raids against Kurdish villages could not force the Kurds to surrender. The huge cost of the government's military campaign (estimated at $60 million) and its failure to achieve victory contributed to Qasim's overthrow in 1963. In subsequent years, cease-fires and promises were made and broken, and armed hostilities flared up and died down, but the Kurdish separatist movement survived, causing ongoing concern among policymakers in Baghdad.

THE HASHIMITE KINGDOM OF JORDAN: THE SURVIVAL OF MONARCHY

In 1946, Amir Abdallah reaped the rewards of his wartime loyalty to Great Britain: Transjordan was granted independence and Abdallah was allowed to proclaim himself king. He soon achieved the important role in regional affairs he had sought since his state was created, but it came at a high price. The outcome of the Arab-Israeli war of 1948 had profound territorial and demographic implications for Transjordan. Not only did the Palestinian exodus draw half a million refugees onto Transjordanian soil, but King Abdallah's annexation of the West Bank in 1948 brought an additional 400,000 settled Palestinians into the country's population. Jordan (the new name Abdallah gave his country in 1948) suddenly contained a population that was two-thirds Palestinian. On the whole, the Palestinians were better educated, more urbanized, and decidedly more politicized than the kingdom's other inhabitants. Their presence as a discontented majority stimulated the formation of the first organized political opposition to the Jordanian monarchy.

King Abdallah tried to win the allegiance of his new Palestinian subjects by allowing them to acquire Jordanian citizenship and appointing a few of them to his cabinet. However, Palestinians viewed Abdallah as an accomplice of the British and held him responsible for the partition of their homeland. In 1951, a Palestinian assassinated the king outside al-Aqsa mosque in Jerusalem. In his tribute to Abdallah, British prime minister Winston Churchill unwittingly revealed one of the causes of the king's murder: "We have," he said, "lost a faithful comrade and ally."²

Abdallah's grandson Husayn became king in 1953 at age eighteen. King Husayn appeared to be the most vulnerable of the Arab monarchs, and observers regularly predicted his overthrow. Yet he survived assassination plots, coup attempts, the defeat of 1967, the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO) crisis of 1970, and diplomatic setbacks to become one of the most durable monarchs, ruling until his death in 1999. He owed his longevity on the throne to political astuteness, a loyal army, and substantial economic assistance from the United States. Educated at Harrow and Sandhurst, Husayn communicated to Western audiences in impeccable English. But he also spoke eloquent Arabic and possessed skills as a pilot, horseman, and marksman—all virtues that appealed to the tribally recruited Jordanian army, with which the king cultivated excellent relations.

Soon after assuming the throne, Husayn faced a crisis sparked by the clash between Nasser and the Western alliance. Within Jordan, Nasserism offered hope to the destitute Palestinians crowded in refugee camps as well as to the Palestinian intellectuals, merchants, and peasants on the West Bank who were unwilling subjects of the Hashimite kingdom. Husayn was pressured from one direction, by Britain, to join the Baghdad Pact and from another, by Nasser and Nasser's supporters in Jordan, to resist the British. Husayn's ultimate decision to reject membership in the pact resulted in the withdrawal of the British subsidy on which Jordan's economic survival depended. Egypt, Syria, and Saudi Arabia replaced the British subsidy by contributing funds of their own. It appeared that Husayn was prepared to break the ties that bound his kingdom to Britain. However, his flirtation with Nasserist-inspired anti-Westernism was short-lived.

In 1957, an explosion of opposition inspired by a convergence of all the era's reformist currents—Nasserism, Ba'thism, and communism—rocked the Jordanian regime to its core. Pressures from Palestinian citizens for a greater share of political power and from high-ranking civilian and military officials for Jordan's distancing itself from Britain and pursuing Arab unity more actively both threatened to topple the regime. Pan-Arabism, it appeared, was more dangerous to the monarchy than were ties to the West. Husayn struck back at his domestic opposition by suspending the constitution and proclaiming martial law. And in a decision with far-reaching consequences, he requested US military support and economic assistance. Under the terms of the new Eisenhower Doctrine, Washington responded with an immediate grant of $10 million and the dispatch of the Sixth Fleet to the eastern Mediterranean. Husayn had chosen Western aid to save his throne.

It was a choice that made the Jordanian king the target of a steady stream of anti-Hashimite propaganda from Egypt and Syria, the two states that had merged to form the UAR in February 1958. Matters came to a head with Qasim's overthrow of the Hashimite monarchy in Iraq in July of that fateful year. Qasim's coup occurred at a time of increasing tension in Jordan brought on by the activities of Nasser's supporters in organizing a movement against Husayn. Would the last surviving ruler of the British-installed Hashimite dynasty be carried off in the wave of takeovers by reformist-oriented military officers that had already engulfed Syria and Egypt and now included Iraq? In the tense days of July 1958, Husayn called on his army to keep order and appealed to Britain for additional military assistance. Britain responded by sending a contingent of 2,000 paratroops from Cyprus. They remained in Jordan for over a year, a striking symbol of that country's continued reliance on British assistance.

A steady increase in US financial aid rewarded Husayn's commitment to the Western alliance. By the early 1960s, the United States was infusing $50 million into the country annually. The skillful application of these funds enabled Jordan to experience a period of sustained economic growth. The regime modernized the country's once-primitive communications network, undertook irrigation projects on the West Bank, and developed the tourist industry, centered on Jerusalem and Bethlehem, to the point where it constituted 25 percent of annual revenue. During the 1960s, Jordan transitioned from the economic dependent of Britain it had been in 1950 to a relatively prosperous developing state with a per capita income second only to Lebanon's among the non-oil-producing Arab states.

Following the 1958 crisis, Egypt and Syria targeted Husayn in a propaganda blitz branding him as a lackey of Western imperialism. But despite Nasser's charges against him from without and the Palestinians' resentment toward him from within, Husayn was neither overwhelmed by the tide of Pan-Arabism nor overthrown by socialist revolutionaries. Jordan in the late 1960s seemed an anachronism, existing in the Arab heartland as a free-enterprise monarchy allied to the West. But Jordan was also intricately engaged in Arab affairs as a member of the Arab League, a direct neighbor of Israel, and the dwelling place of the world's largest concentration of Palestinians. These factors would color Husayn's decisions during the June War.

LEBANON: THE PRECARIOUS SECTARIAN BALANCE

For readers whose main impressions of Beirut are of a metropolis ravaged by civil war, it is especially important to realize what Lebanon's capital city once was and what its success represented. From the end of World War II to the late 1960s, Beirut was the jewel of the eastern Mediterranean, a glittering metropolis that served as an economic and cultural bridge between the West and the Middle East. To some extent, Beirut's prosperity was made possible by the upheavals in the surrounding Arab states during the 1950s. Faced with nationalization laws in Cairo, Damascus, and Baghdad, Arab entrepreneurs and their capital headed for Lebanon, with its laissez-faire economic system. Lebanese governments encouraged the movement of foreign capital into the country by deregulating the currency exchanges and adopting banking secrecy laws. These and other measures made Beirut a major international banking center and earned Lebanon the reputation as the Switzerland of the Middle East. The government also removed trade restrictions, thus fostering the import and re-export trade in which the Lebanese excelled and prospered.

Beyond its status as a bustling financial and commercial center, Beirut was a home for political exiles and a haven of free expression in an area of the world where government censorship was becoming the norm. A free press in which the most divergent political views were aired, a burgeoning publishing industry, and a university that was a magnet for students from all over the Arab world contributed to Beirut’s role as a hub of intellectual exchange and political discussion. The city offered other attractions as well. Its luxury hotels, Las Vegas–style casino, and flashy nightclubs drew all manner of pleasure seekers. In this regard, it has been remarked that “every region of the globe needs one city where the rules don’t apply, where sin is the norm, and where money can buy anything or anyone.”³ For the Middle East, Beirut was that city.

But Beirut stood for something far more important than material prosperity and pleasurable nightlife—the city showed that sectarian pluralism could work. Jews fled Egypt and the Kurds of Iraq were shelled by their own government, but Beirut thrived as a multireligious, multiethnic urban mosaic. The city’s long fall into the abyss of communal violence in 1975–1976 sent a frightening question to the Middle East as a whole: If sectarian cooperation had failed in the relatively tolerant atmosphere of Beirut, what chance did it have in the rest of the region?

Yet even during Beirut’s days of glory, deep sectarian differences were never far beneath the surface of Lebanese life. As we saw in Chapter 12, Lebanon developed a unique political system in which communal loyalties were institutionalized. The constitution of 1926, the census of 1932, and the National Pact of 1943 established the basis of confessional politics and identified Lebanon as an Arab country but one that would not attempt to federate with any other Arab state. This proposition was put to a severe test in the age of Pan-Arabism. The sum total of the Lebanese system was, then, a balance of sectarian rivalries. Communal differences were not resolved but, rather, were neutralized in a system that prevented any one sect from achieving dominance. In the absence of a monolithic state, diversity flourished, and Lebanon gave the impression of a peaceful sectarian coexistence.

However, the perseverance of sectarian communal loyalties stultified Lebanon’s political development and allowed family and religious ties to prevail over national ones. Politics was dominated by established families whose power derived from economic status and a long-standing tradition of leadership. Within each of the country’s electoral districts, a political boss (za‘im) from the region’s leading family manipulated elections and distributed political favors and financial rewards. The za‘im might himself be a candidate for parliament, or he might prefer to round up votes for someone else who would then be in his debt. Votes were often obtained through bribery and, if necessary, force, which the za‘im’s armed retainers meted out at will. The individuals who were elected to parliament through the za‘im system regarded their primary responsibility as serving the needs of local clients; they lacked any urgent sense of national issues and used parliament to further their regional-sectarian interests. The za‘im was in effect a feudal lord dressed in a tailored European suit. The attire misled many outside observers at the time and prompted them to write glowing reports about Lebanese democracy. Such reports were usually filed from Beirut, a city whose ample amenities hid the blunt force that made up Lebanese politics.

Rather than giving rise to ideological political parties, the za‘im system tended to encourage the formation of sectarian-based blocs loyal to a single individual. The bloc that most forcefully represented the Maronite perspective and that most nearly approximated a national Maronite political organization was the Kataib, or Phalange. Founded as a Maronite youth organization by Pierre Gemayel in 1936, the Phalange was influenced by European Fascist parties. Its youthful scouting organization developed into an armed militia controlled by Gemayel and ready to defend the notion that Lebanon was the special Maronite homeland. One of the Phalange’s slogans, “Lebanon above all,” was an uncompromising commitment to the preservation of a distinctive Maronite-dominated country independent of any Arab federation.

An altogether different bloc was the small but influential Progressive Socialist Party founded in 1949 by the Druze leader Kamal Jumblatt. Although the party protected Druze interests, it also reflected Jumblatt’s radical reformist ideals and therefore crossed sectarian boundaries, appealing to a broad cross-section of Lebanese who knew they were missing out on the good life enjoyed by the political bosses and Beirut’s elite. Jumblatt became an important figure in Lebanese politics; he was a traditional za‘im but also a credible social reformer able to put together leftist coalitions that challenged Maronite supremacy and welcomed Pan-Arabism. The Sunni Muslim organizations were fragmented among a number of regional political bosses, some of whom were attracted to Nasser's Pan-Arabism. Lebanon's Sunni Muslims still felt a deep attachment to Syria and chafed at the circumstances that left them with less influence than they felt they deserved. In the age of Pan-Arabism, Lebanon stood out as a Western-oriented, Christian-dominated capitalist state with a discontented Sunni Muslim population.

Any examination of Lebanon's various crises since World War II must take into consideration the institutional role of the president of the republic. The National Pact ensured that the president would be a Maronite Christian, and the constitution conferred upon the head of state exceptionally strong powers relative to the parliament. To prevent a powerful president from perpetuating his rule, the constitution limited an individual to a single six-year term of office. The country's first two postindependence presidents, Bishara al-Khuri (1943–1952) and Camille Chamoun (1952–1958), attempted to alter this constitutional provision. In so doing, both plunged their country into crisis.

Al-Khuri, a passionate advocate for Lebanese independence (see Chapter 12), proved less adept as an administrator than he was as a negotiator. Although his presidential term coincided with Lebanon's economic boom, his inclination to overlook relatives' and friends' corrupt financial practices contributed to a surge of opposition to him. His opponents became more outspoken when al-Khuri, in the za'im tradition, manipulated parliamentary elections so that he was chosen for a second consecutive term as president in 1949. He did not serve out his new term, however. He resigned in 1952 when a coalition of his opponents, including fellow Maronites, called a successful general strike to protest his methods.

His successor, Chamoun, was committed to the Western alliance and the preservation of Lebanon's free enterprise system and was responsible for much of the legislation that made Lebanon's banking regulations so attractive to outside investors. Unfortunately for Chamoun, Lebanon was attractive to other outside forces as well. Chamoun's presidency coincided with the spread of US-Soviet rivalry in the Middle East, the rise of Nasser, and the emergence of demands for reform by Lebanon's Muslims. The Muslims called for a new census, believing that its outcome would show that they had become the largest religious community in the country and deserved a greater apportionment of government positions than they held at the time.

In these circumstances, Chamoun had to face directly the question of whether Lebanon should commit itself to the West or assert its Arab heritage by forging closer relations with Egypt and Syria. His own Maronite community was strongly committed to Lebanon's Western orientation, but increasing numbers of Muslims were attracted to Nasserist Pan-Arabism. In an attempt to keep both communities satisfied, Chamoun opted not to join the Baghdad Pact, at the same time emphasizing Lebanon's friendship with the West. During the Suez crisis of 1956, Chamoun irritated Nasser and his Lebanese supporters by refusing to sever diplomatic relations with Britain and France when they invaded Egypt.

The tensions created by the conflicting internal and external pulls on Lebanon's loyalties came to a head in the eventful summer of 1958. Chamoun appeared to be contemplating measures by which he might serve a second term in office, a prospect the Muslim community rejected. Muslim opposition to Chamoun's plans developed into a full-scale rebellion, during which such major cities as Tripoli and Sidon broke away from the control of the central government. President Chamoun ordered the army to put down the revolt, but the commander in chief, General Fuad Shihab, refused to deploy the armed forces in an internal political dispute. The Lebanese civil war was still simmering when Qasim overthrew the Hashimite regime in Iraq on July 14. Chamoun immediately requested US assistance to save his country from falling under the control of pro-Nasser forces.

The United States responded promptly. On the day after the Iraqi coup, 15,000 US Marines landed on the beaches of Lebanon. The United States was determined to preserve a friendly regime in Lebanon, whether it was threatened by communism or Nasserism. Chamoun, the target of much of the Muslim animosity, stepped aside after completing his presidential term in September. As his successor the parliament chose Fuad Shihab, the army commander whose deft handling of the military during the civil war met with both Muslim and Christian approval. Once Shihab became president, Muslim-Christian relations improved, and Lebanon returned to business as usual.

However, Shihab differed from his predecessors. A selfless politician dedicated to the interests of Lebanon as a whole, he recognized the source of Muslim discontent and launched an ambitious program of political and economic reforms. His policies were sufficiently unique to acquire the label Shihabism. Shihab's goal was to modernize the state. In the Lebanese context, this meant increasing the central government's power at the expense of the political bosses and installing the basics of a social welfare system. Shihab was aware of the need to reduce the disaffection that had led to the 1958 civil war by providing Muslims with a stake in an independent Lebanon. He ensured that more Muslims received top positions in the administration than had previously been the case. In addition, the president sharply increased government expenditures, especially on public works projects such as road building, rural electrification, and the extension of the water supply to neglected rural areas. During Shihab's term in office (1958–1964), the power of the president and of the central government in general expanded noticeably. Although the president did not succeed in achieving all his reforms, Shihabism was a positive force in Lebanese life: It represented a commitment to orderly government, law enforcement, social reform, and sectarian reconciliation. However, it did not end sectarian politics. Members of each confessional group still manifested a primary loyalty to their religious community and jealously guarded the privileges they believed were due that community.

As for the external pressures that had contributed to the civil war, the breakup of the UAR in 1961 reduced to some extent the immediate need for Lebanon to make a decision about its Pan-Arab future. Moreover, the socialist policies the Nasser regime adopted after 1961 caused many Lebanese Muslim entrepreneurs to question whether Arab unity was worth the surrender of the free enterprise system that served them so well. Nevertheless, Lebanon remained vulnerable to subversion by Nasserites and Ba'thists and subject to the perpetual internal divisions of a nation that was in and of the Arab world but inhabited by a population torn between its desires to be assimilated within that world and to be distinct from it.

ISRAEL, THE ARAB STATES, AND THE JUNE WAR

Origins of the War

Even during periods of nonbelligerence, the Arab-Israeli conflict shaped the attitudes of the participants. Israelis lived in constant insecurity, fearing the potential military power of a unified Arab nation. Within the Arab states, memories of the Israeli victory in 1948 and the Israeli invasion of Egypt in 1956 were an active part of political consciousness. Much of the rhetoric surrounding Nasserism contained promises for the liberation of Palestine from its Zionist occupiers. Arab unity was pictured as a way for the Arabs to acquire the strength needed to achieve a military victory over Israel. From the Arab perspective, Israel was an expansionist arm of Western imperialism and, as such, would sooner or later launch an attack on the Arabs to gain more territory for Jewish settlement. Israelis, in turn, accepted the Arab propaganda at face value and watched with alarm as the Soviets poured arms into Egypt, Syria, and Iraq. Although the Arab leaders behaved much more cautiously than their propaganda suggested, frequent clashes erupted along the Jordanian-Israeli border during the 1960s, instigated by the fledgling Palestinian resistance organizations that began to form in the late 1950s. Palestinian guerrillas based in Syria conducted raids into Israel through Jordanian territory; Israel would then retaliate in force against targets in Jordan. Despite these incidents, in early 1967, the eastern Arab states were more concerned with inter-Arab affairs than with Israel. The quarrels between the monarchies and the socialist states seemed more likely to spiral into armed conflict than did the tensions between Israel and its neighbors. Nasser, his prestige diminished by his failure to bring about a durable Arab union and by his military intervention in Yemen, was preoccupied with retaining his leadership of the reformist bloc of Arab states and rejuvenating Egypt's lagging economy.

In May 1967, Soviet and Syrian intelligence reported that Israel was preparing a large-scale military operation against Syria for its sponsorship of Palestinian guerrilla activities. The reports were incorrect but at the time were taken to be true. Nasser, in order to bolster his Pan-Arab leadership role, responded to the threat to Syria by deploying troops in the Sinai Peninsula. This move was one of posturing, an attempt to demonstrate to the Arab world that Egypt stood shoulder to shoulder with other Arab countries against their common enemy. It was a successful gesture, and pro-Nasser, anti-Israeli demonstrations broke out in several Arab cities. Nasser was thus tempted into escalating his brinkmanship—by requesting the withdrawal of all UN forces from Sinai. Probably to his surprise, the request was quickly granted, as the UN forces that had formed a shield between Egypt and Israel were evacuated. The momentum seemed to be with Nasser, and he took the crisis a step further by reoccupying the UN positions at Sharm al-Shaykh and announcing a blockade on Israeli shipping passing through the Straits of Tiran.

In retrospect, it appears Nasser was bluffing. With a large part of the Egyptian army bogged down in Yemen, Egypt was in no position to go to war with Israel. It is likely Nasser expected Soviet-US intervention to calm the crisis and permit him to escape with his reputation renewed. However, Nasser had unleashed emotions that were beyond his ability to control. He gave the appearance of preparing for the final showdown with Israel, and other Arab leaders clambered to get on his side. On May 30, King Husayn of Jordan, who, only a few days earlier, had been denounced in the Egyptian press, flew to Cairo to sign a mutual defense pact with Egypt. The Iraqi government joined the alliance a few days later.

The Israeli government of Prime Minister Levi Eshkol could not tolerate the blockade of the Straits of Tiran nor allow the continued buildup of Arab solidarity around Nasser, which, if unchecked, would place Israel under intolerable long-term pressures. The Israeli cabinet decided the situation required military action. Accordingly, in the early morning of June 5, 1967, the Israeli air force attacked air bases throughout Egypt and destroyed most of the Egyptian air force while it was still on the ground. Later that day, after Syria and Jordan had entered the conflict, Israeli pilots effectively demolished the air forces of those countries as well. With undisputed control of the air, the Israeli forces defeated the Egyptian army in Sinai and advanced to the east bank of the Suez Canal. The two states signed a cease-fire on June 9. Meanwhile, Jordan engaged Israeli forces in the Jerusalem area on June 5, only to be driven out of East Jerusalem and across the Jordan River, abandoning the West Bank to Israeli occupation. Finally, the Israeli army turned its full might against Syria and wrested the Golan Heights from Syrian control (see Map 16.1). The cease-fire on the Golan front was agreed to on June 11. In a mere six days, Israel had resoundingly defeated three Arab states. The war was an ignominious disaster for the Arab forces and a shattering blow to Nasserism.

MAP 16.1. Israel and the territories occupied in the June 1967 war, Sinai, but not the Gaza Strip, was returned to Egypt under the terms of the 1979 Egyptian-Israeli treaty.

The Aftermath of the June War

The Arab defeat was costly in both material and psychological terms. Each of the three Arab belligerents surrendered territory to the Israelis. Egypt was deprived of the revenues from the Sinai oil fields and the Suez Canal, which remained closed to shipping from 1967 to 1975. To add to the humiliation, Egypt had to make up these lost revenues by accepting subsidies from Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, monarchies Nasser had roundly criticized in the recent past. Jordan lost not only the West Bank, its most productive agricultural region, but also the tourist sites of Jerusalem and Bethlehem. The Golan Heights were not a major economic loss for Syria, but Israel's occupation of them placed the Israeli forces within easy striking distance of Damascus. In addition, the conflict had decimated the Arab states' armed forces. Egypt lost 12,000 men and 80 percent of its air force and armor, Syrian losses were 2,500 killed, and the Jordanian army was temporarily put out of action as a fighting unit. The Arab regimes that had pledged to liberate Palestine were militarily prostrate and deprived of any of the bargaining power associated with armed strength.

Although the war lasted only six days, it created another tragic Arab refugee situation and a complex demographic dilemma for Israel. Jordan, in surrendering the West Bank, lost a large portion of its settled Palestinian population, but at the same time, it received 300,000 new refugees fleeing the West Bank and Gaza Strip. In Syria, about 80,000 inhabitants were uprooted from the Golan Heights, and in Egypt, the continued fighting along the Suez Canal reduced the cities of the canal zone to ruins and forced the evacuation of their inhabitants to other areas of the country. Israel, with the capture of East Jerusalem, the West Bank, Gaza Strip, Sinai, and the Golan Heights, suddenly found itself administering a new Arab population of 1.5 million people. This development raised important questions about the character of the Israeli state in terms of its religious composition and democratic traditions (see Chapter 17).

In addition, the war revealed the disparity in the military capabilities of the Arab and Israeli armed forces. The speed and totality of the Israeli victory imparted an aura of invincibility to Israel's military. Daring young generals like Ariel Sharon became national heroes, and the almost perfect performance of all the components of the Israeli armed forces made them an object of study by envious military organizations worldwide. The marked superiority of the Israelis gave them a certain arrogance and removed any urgency for compromise and negotiation in the wake of their decisive victory. By contrast, the Arab armed forces, especially those of Egypt, were made to appear incompetent. In the war's aftermath, investigations brought to light a level of corruption and mismanagement in the Egyptian military that disgraced the entire Nasser regime.

This psychological shock at the apparent hollowness of the new Arab regimes was perhaps the most profound effect of the war. Much as the defeat of 1948 had discredited the old regimes of landed elite, urban notables, and wealthy monarchs, so the 1967 debacle tarnished the reputations of the military regimes that had come to power in the 1950s with their programs of social reform and their promises of strength through Arab unity. By June 11, 1967, the new regimes seemed every bit as corrupt, dysfunctional, and inept as their predecessors. What the historian Hanna Batatu has written about attitudes toward the Iraqi regime after June 1967 can also be applied to Syria and, to some extent, Egypt:

In the eyes of the people, the whole concept of the officers' state came into disrepute, for it became obvious that by its entry into politics and its division into factions, the officer corps had not only made a mess of government or become a seedbed of political instability but had also seriously reduced the effectiveness of the military system. Not to mention the fact that, by transforming itself into a privileged order, it had become psychologically divorced from the rest of the people.

Batatu concluded his analysis with the observation "that profound and fundamental social and political changes cannot be realized without long and sustained efforts and sacrifices, and massive popular participation; that, in other words, progressive ideological verbiage is not enough."⁴ The disillusionment Batatu described was widely felt. Arif's Iraqi regime fell to a Ba'thist coup in July 1968; the Syrian regime survived for a time, but in November 1970, it too was overthrown, and Hafiz al-Assad began his long rule in Damascus.

In Egypt, President Nasser managed to retain his authority and a large measure of his personal popularity during the bitter, soul-searching aftermath of the war. However, the solidarity of the officer corps on which the regime was built collapsed in the wake of purges, attempted takeovers, and the arrest and suicide in June 1967 of Nasser's longtime confidant and commander in chief of the armed forces, Field Marshal Abd al-Hakim Amr. Egyptian cynics explained Amr's demise with the phrase "he was suicided." An extensive Soviet effort restored Egypt's air force and armor to their prewar levels by the end of 1967. At the same time, the Soviets expanded their military mission in Egypt to several thousand advisers, making Egypt completely dependent on the Soviet Union for its military survival.

The peace that usually follows wars did not come to the Middle East after 1967. Increased Palestinian guerrilla activity in Jordan met with Israeli retaliation in force. And on the Suez Canal front, sporadic artillery exchanges erupted into full-scale combat in 1969 when Nasser, in an attempt to salvage Egyptian pride and to demonstrate that the country's ability to fight was not destroyed, launched what he called a war of attrition. It consisted of heavy artillery shelling of Israeli positions, to which the Israelis responded with barrages of their own, reducing the Suez Canal cities to ruins. By 1970, the war of attrition had escalated to the point where Israel was launching more than 150 air strikes a day, sometimes against targets deep within Egypt.

The problem for the would-be peacemakers was that the Arab states would not negotiate from a position of weakness, and Israel saw no need to make concessions from its position of strength. A basic framework for regional peace was put forth in the famous Resolution 242 adopted by the UN Security Council on November 22, 1967. The resolution asserted "the inadmissibility of the acquisition of territory by war" and called for a just and lasting peace based on the withdrawal of Israeli forces from territories occupied in the June War and the acknowledgment of the right of every state in the area to live in peace within secure and recognized boundaries. The resolution also affirmed the need of achieving a "just settlement of the refugee problem." Although Egypt, Jordan, and Israel endorsed Resolution 242, Syria and the Palestinian organizations rejected it. Because the document was so ambiguous and open-ended, even the accepting parties interpreted it quite differently. Thus, the resolution failed to provide a consensual basis for a peace settlement.

However, Secretary of State William Rogers of the United States finally managed to put together a cease-fire plan that Egypt, Jordan, and Israel supported. The plan included provision for a ninety-day cease-fire that went into effect in July 1970. Although the cease-fire was renewed several times and was thus successful in bringing an end to the war of attrition, the United States could not convince Egypt to sign a peace agreement with Israel or to persuade Israel to withdraw from occupied Egyptian territory. But at least the Rogers Plan had silenced the guns along the Suez Canal and given all parties an opportunity to reassess their positions.

Significantly, the June War also gave impetus to the rise of Palestinian military and political organizations (as discussed in Chapter 17). In September 1970, clashes in Jordan between Palestinians and the Jordanian army prompted Nasser to offer his personal mediation of the crisis. An Arab summit meeting convened in Cairo and worked out a cease-fire that was acceptable to the Palestinians and King Husayn. On September 28, the day after the conference concluded, Nasser, who had been involved in round-the-clock negotiations, died of a heart attack. Despite the blows Nasser's prestige had suffered, outpourings of genuine grief and shock greeted his passing. At a time of acute crisis and uncertainty, the dominant Arab figure of the past fifteen years was removed from the scene. The Arab world temporarily suspended its rivalries to mourn for Nasser and to ponder its future without him.

CONCLUSION: THE NASSER ERA IN PERSPECTIVE

In the opinion of Malcolm Kerr, Nasser "symbolized a range of attitudes and actions reaching far beyond Egypt and beyond the particular things he himself said and did."⁵ There is no question that Egypt exercised a profound regional influence during the Nasser years. Not all of the domestic turmoil in the Middle East can be attributed to Nasser, yet it seems clear that his example inspired imitators and attracted followers throughout the Arab world. His attempts to break away from the Western embrace and its imperial connotations found a responsive echo in Baghdad and Damascus, in Tripoli and Algiers, and the promise of social and political reform associated with his policies became the ideal for reformers elsewhere. And millions, disillusioned at the status of the Arabs in recent history, shared the dream of Arab unity. Yet Nasser's intervention in other states' affairs was often detrimental to the goals he claimed to have set. Nasser became concerned with external challenges to his leadership of the Pan-Arab movement, and he exhausted Egypt's resources in external adventures ranging from attempts to subvert the Jordanian and Iraqi regimes, to intervention in Yemen, to the disaster of 1967.

Although the sentiments that infused Nasserism were inspirational, the doctrine may have passed away with its namesake. Arab critics accused Nasserism of "muddism," of trying to satisfy too many conflicting aspirations. In this view, Nasserism was unable to decide whether it was religious or secular, democratic or authoritarian, socialist or capitalist. It contained parts of all of these orientations but took no clear stand on which was most important. By contrast, Michel Aflaq provided the Ba'th Party with a much more sharply defined set of principles than was found in Nasserism, but the Ba'th lacked a politician with Nasser's leadership qualities. Perhaps Nasserism's wide appeal was based more on its activism, its encouragement for change, than on any precise doctrine. If this was indeed the case, then there was little in Nasserism that could be transferred to a successor.

The Israeli air force strike on June 5, 1967, marked the true end of the Nasser era. From that point until his death, Nasser focused on political survival and departed from the policies that had defined Nasserism. After June 1967, he allowed the Soviet Union to acquire a dominant influence within the Egyptian military, dropped the quest for Arab unity, and worked in tandem with King Husayn of Jordan, whom he had vilified on numerous previous occasions. Moreover, Nasser's acceptance of UN Resolution 242 and the Rogers Plan suggested to some that he was prepared to make an accommodation with Israel. At his death, the hopes he had raised were as shattered as the Egyptian cities along the Suez Canal, and the Arab public he had lifted with his promises felt disillusionment and despair.

ISRAEL AND THE PALESTINIANS FROM 1948 TO THE 1970S

Following its creation in war, Israel faced enormous peacetime challenges of nation building. Its leaders had to establish a governmental structure, set up a judicial system, and transform the communal organizations of the Yishuv into Israeli national institutions. In addition, because Israel's reason for being was founded on the claim to be a specifically Jewish nation, its ruling elite had to determine what role religion would play in the state's institutional life. During the first years of independence, the political leaders reached a consensus on the administrative structure of the state; however, attitudes toward the proper role of Jewish religious law in public life differed widely.

Israeli military success in the June War (1967) brought new confidence but also created new problems. With the conquest of the West Bank, the Gaza Strip, and the Golan Heights, Israel became an occupying power, ruling in an often arbitrary manner the million Palestinian Arabs brought unwillingly under its domination. The future of the occupied territories became the focus of a divisive national debate. What some Israelis viewed as an unjustifiable occupation, others saw as a God-given opportunity to hasten the redemption of Jewish people by laying claim to all the lands of ancient Israel. Tensions between peace activists and settlers and between secularists and advocates of the need to introduce a greater measure of religious law grew rather than lessened as Israel entered the fourth decade of its existence as an independent state.

While Israelis argued about the future of the occupied territories, groups of Palestinian exiles took steps to recover their lands. One of the most far-reaching results of the June War was the rise to prominence of Palestinian resistance groups. Despairing at the failure of the Arab states to achieve their repatriation for them, Palestinians assumed the responsibility of liberating their homeland themselves. Palestinian guerrilla organizations undertook armed action against Israel and carried out international acts of terrorism designed to attract attention to the Palestinians' plight. In the course of establishing an armed resistance movement, the Palestinians became a factor in the domestic politics of the Arab states and forced the entrenched Arab leadership to take their demands into account. Although the commando operations never posed a serious military threat to Israel, they did provoke large-scale Israeli reprisals and contributed to the ongoing tension in the Middle East since the 1970s. Outside the region, the diplomatic initiatives of the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO) and its chairman, Yasir Arafat, succeeded in placing the question of Palestinian rights on the agenda of the United Nations and in shining a spotlight on the Israeli occupation of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

THE ISRAELI POLITICAL SYSTEM AND POLITICAL CULTURE

The high level of communal organization that characterized the Yishuv facilitated Israel's transition to an independent state. The institutions—with, in many cases, the same personnel—that had administered the Yishuv were transformed into national institutions at Israel's creation. During the years from 1949 to 1977, the labor-oriented Mapai Party, the organization that had played a key role in guiding the Yishuv, dominated Israeli politics. David Ben-Gurion, the towering figure of Israel's creation, held the offices of prime minister and minister of defense for most of the period from 1949 to 1963. He stamped the new state with his forceful personality, determined its foundational policies and its political practices, and imbued the office of prime minister with paramount authority in the political system.

One of Ben-Gurion's pressing concerns was to enshrine the authority of the state over the diverse communal organizations that had made up the Yishuv. His pursuit of this goal was most forcefully demonstrated in the Altalena affair of June 1948. At Israel's independence, units of the Haganah were reorganized as the Israeli Defense Forces (IDF) and placed under the authority of the civilian minister of defense. However, two dissident military organizations, the Irgun, led by Menachem Begin, and the smaller Lehi, refused to relinquish their autonomy and continued to conduct independent military operations. The crisis of authority came to a head when the ship Altalena arrived off the Israeli coast with a consignment of arms destined for the Irgun. Ben-Gurion ordered the IDF to prevent the arms from being unloaded. An armed struggle ensued, the Altalena was shelled and eventually sank, and several Irgun members were killed or wounded. The remaining autonomous military units were absorbed into the IDF, ensuring that the central state exercised control of all military forces. The affair also had the effect of solidifying an enduring enmity between Ben-Gurion and Begin.

Although fluidity characterized Israel's institutional framework in the early years of state building, the main features of the political system had crystallized by 1949. Israel was established as a parliamentary democracy with a unicameral legislature (the Knesset) composed of 120 elected representatives. Candidates for the Knesset ran on a national slate rather than as representatives from particular districts and were thus elected by the nation at large. All citizens, male and female, received suffrage at age eighteen. Israel's form of parliamentary government provided the prime minister and cabinet with a particularly strong role in policy formulation and decision making. The presidency was intended to be mainly a ceremonial office. In 1949, an ailing Chaim Weizmann left London, where he had long championed the Zionist cause, and made the journey to Tel Aviv to become Israel's first president.

Israel is sometimes referred to as "the party state" in recognition of the decisive influence Israeli parties have exercised on its political life. Because Israelis voted for parties, not individual candidates, it was virtually impossible to enter politics except through the mechanism of a party. When elections were announced, the party leadership prepared a numbered list of candidates and presented it to the public. Voters selected the party of their choice, and seats to the Knesset were assigned by proportional representation. For example, a party receiving 25 percent of the vote would be awarded thirty seats in the 120-member Knesset. These seats would go to the first thirty names on the party's list. It was crucial for ambitious politicians to secure a high ranking on their party's list. They could do so only if they satisfied the party leaders by adhering rigorously to the party line during Knesset sessions. A maverick party member was likely to be dropped to a lower position on the party list and risked not gaining a Knesset seat. This system endowed party leaders with extensive powers, which they often exercised behind closed doors and with little accountability.

During the mandate years, organizations representing all the diverse strands of Zionism and religious orthodoxy competed intensely for new immigrants' loyalties. To attract adherents, they offered a spectrum of social, educational, and recreational services. With independence, the state took over some of these services, but the diversity of tenaciously held views remained a feature of Israeli politics. This diversity found expression in the formation of numerous political parties that stamped Israel with a unique and sometimes troublesome multiparty structure.

Israel's election law further encouraged the existence of numerous political parties. According to the law, any party that received 1 percent of the vote was entitled to representation in the Knesset. Under this system, there was no need for political groups to modify even their most extreme positions in order to gain seats in the Knesset. Raising the minimum threshold in 2003 to 2 percent and, in 2014, to 3.25 percent has not significantly reduced the number of parties. Jewish parties at the far ends of the political spectrum still have a good chance of joining a coalition government.

Because the popular vote was divided among so many different parties, no single party received an absolute majority in the Knesset. It was—and remains—normal for each Knesset to contain representatives from ten to fifteen different parties. Even during the heyday of Ben-Gurion's popularity, his Mapai Party never held more than 47 of the Knesset's 120 seats. As a result of this multiparty system, the party with the most seats could form a government only by seeking out coalition partners. By its nature, coalition government requires compromise and concession. During the Ben-Gurion era, stable coalitions were constructed between apparent opposites as the secular, moderately socialist Mapai frequently allied with the orthodox religious Right to create a parliamentary majority that endorsed Mapai's overall program while conceding portions of the religious parties' platforms. Consequently, small parties that became part of a coalition government exercised an influence on legislation out of all proportion to their share of the popular vote.

The presence of so many competing and fiercely held positions in the political arena gave rise to a contentious and vociferous political culture. Knesset debates, even on seemingly minor issues, were often filled with name calling, denunciations, and passionate oratory in which opposing factions accused one another of the basest intentions and warned of the gravest consequences if their own position was not upheld.

The Changing Composition of the Israeli Population

In the first years of statehood, Israel's major national effort was devoted to immigrant absorption. From 1948 to 1951, the Jewish population of Israel swelled from approximately 650,000 to slightly more than 1.3 million. This was the result of an influx of some 684,000 immigrants, a phenomenon that posed enormous economic, cultural, and social problems for the new state. About half of the new immigrants were from Eastern Europe, the so-called displaced persons uprooted by the Nazis. If life in Israel demanded wrenching adjustments from the existence many immigrants had known previously, it at least presented familiar patterns of discourse. Eastern European ideologies had shaped Zionism, Eastern European leaders had forged the institutions of the new state, and individuals of Eastern European birth occupied the top positions in Israel's political, judicial, religious, and educational hierarchy. With the exception of Yitzhak Rabin, who was born in mandate Palestine, all of Israel's prime ministers from 1948 to 1992 were born in either Russia or Poland.

However, the first wave of immigration included at least as many Oriental (Sephardic) Jews from Arab countries as it did European (Ashkenazi) Jews. For various reasons—some related to concerns over their status and safety within Arab society after the 1948 war, others involving active outreach policies by Israel—large numbers of individuals from the long-established Jewish communities in such Arab countries as Egypt, Iraq, Yemen, and Morocco immigrated to Israel. Between 1948 and 1956, roughly 450,000 Sephardic Jews arrived in the country. They spoke mainly Arabic, and their cultural norms, political experiences, and conceptions of Judaism differed from those of their European counterparts. They did not integrate into Israeli society as rapidly as did the Ashkenazim. Significant numbers of them were settled in new development towns in remote areas or in former Arab housing in the poor quarters of major cities. Ignored by the central authorities, underrepresented politically, and plagued by low participation rates in education and high rates of unemployment, the Sephardim became an impoverished sector of the Israeli population. Over the decades, the gap in income and social status between the Sephardim—including their offspring born in Israel—and the Ashkenazim widened and generated palpable social tensions. By the late 1970s, the Sephardic community composed over half of the country’s population and was making its numerical weight felt in political circles.

The emerging Israeli polity also had to deal with the 160,000 Palestinian Arabs who had remained within the post-1949 borders of the state. The Zionist program had not envisaged the existence of a large, non-Jewish minority population in the future Jewish state, and the question of how to accommodate Israeli notions of social justice with the exclusivity of the Zionist ethos vexed the Israeli leadership. Finally, in 1952, the Knesset passed the Nationality Law, which, in addition to granting automatic citizenship to any Jewish immigrant, awarded Israeli citizenship to Arabs who could prove their long-standing residence in Palestine. At the same time, however, Israeli authorities continued to regard their Arab citizens as a potential fifth column and adopted measures designed to prevent them from developing cohesive representative organizations. From 1948 to 1966, areas of Arab concentration were under the authority of a Military Administration that required Israeli Arabs to carry special identity cards and to obtain travel permits to go from one village to another. During the first decade of Israeli statehood, the government expropriated thousands of acres of Israeli Arab land and forcibly relocated the displaced inhabitants. Israeli Arabs were further alienated by wage and employment discrimination and by their exclusion, because of their non-Jewishness, from the central mission of the Jewish state.

Until the mid-1970s, Israel's effective economic and social controls prevented the Arab minority from forming associations through which it might express its grievances. However, with the rise of a more educated, nontraditional Arab elite and with the dramatic increase in the size of their community (Israeli Arabs numbered nearly 1 million, roughly 20 percent of the population, by the late 1990s), Arab voices began to be heard in the political arena. An additional factor of politicization was the Israeli occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip after 1967, which enabled Israeli Arabs to reestablish contact with relatives in the refugee camps and to become more aware of their shared Palestinian Arab heritage.

Nationality, Religion, and the State: The Ongoing Dilemma

The formation of Israeli national identity was a contested process: Proponents of the application of a greater measure of religious law clashed with secular pragmatists and socialist visionaries intent on building a fresh civil society and culture. The disagreements over the proper components of national identity became all the more intense because the participants viewed them as nothing less than a struggle for Israel's very soul. The contest is far from over, but during the formative years of statehood, it produced a form of national identity that uneasily combined secular and religious outlooks.

In the secular sphere, a new Israeli national culture took shape that stamped Israeli Jews as distinctive from Jews elsewhere. The primary manifestation of this new identity was the establishment of Hebrew as a national language. During the mandate era, Zionist organizations had strived to teach Hebrew to immigrants and to persuade them to use it in place of the languages they currently spoke. The triumph of Hebrew marked a striking achievement of the collective will, and the language became the most significant building block of the new Israeli nationality.

In constructing their national identity, Israelis collectively sought to sever their ties to the European Jewish past, to the Diaspora, with its memories of victimization. One example of this distancing was the practice of replacing traditional Jewish Diaspora family names with distinctively Israeli Hebrew ones. Some of the new last names, such as Galili (of the Galilee) or Shamir (rock), reflected the terrain; others, like Peled (steel) or Oz (might), portrayed images of strength. All provided evidence of a fresh Israeli identity freed from the negative images of the Diaspora past.

The reality of the landscape further contributed to the formation of Israeli national distinctiveness. Tel Aviv, Israel's largest city, gradually shed much of the central European urban ambiance that once characterized its fashionable quarters in favor of a sun-drenched Mediterranean vibe pulsing with café life, crowded beaches, and shops selling falafel, a traditional Arab staple food that appears to have become the Israeli national dish. The Israeli symphony orchestra, the national basketball team, and the Hebrew University of Jerusalem are institutions of the new Israeli national culture—Jewish, of course, but also decisively and uniquely Israeli.

The conscious creation of new symbols of secular national identity in the post–World War II Middle East was not unique to Israel. But there the emerging secular culture clashed with historically rooted convictions concerning the role religious law ought to play in the formation of a Jewish state. In the opinion of one historian, “The question of the relationship between religion and the state is probably the most complex, the most vexing, and potentially the most explosive problem bequeathed to Israel by Jewish history and by the country’s own more recent background.”¹ This question became so problematic because of the widely differing expectations contained within the Zionist movement and then transferred to the arena of Israeli politics and Jewish self-definition. Some Zionists believed the Jewish nation, once it came into existence, would develop a political culture in which religion would be separated from the state. Others dreamed of creating a Jewish nation that would adopt the sacred laws of the Torah as authoritative guidelines for the evolution of state and society; for them, Israel would be Jewish in practice as well as in faith. Most Israelis favored a middle ground, but that was difficult to achieve in the face of the determination of the Jewish religious establishment and the nature of Zionism.

Political Zionism was founded on the principle that a Jewish state was to serve as a homeland for Jews worldwide. This principle was made a reality by the Law of Return (1950), a foundational law of the new state, which gave every Jew in the world the right to immigrate to Israel. Although the Law of Return possessed a compelling logic within the history of Zionism, it gave rise to such difficult questions as: Who is a Jew? Which institution within the state is to authenticate an individual's Jewishness? Is religious law to regulate all of public life? In the contest for the right to decide these matters, the advocates for the application of a greater degree of religious law won several victories. For example, in 1953, the religious courts were recognized as part of the state's formal judicial system and awarded exclusive jurisdiction in matters of personal status (marriage, divorce, the confirmation of wills, and the determination of who qualified as a Jew). The religious, or rabbinical, courts were under the supervision of the Supreme Rabbinical Council, which oversaw the training and appointment of the judges. Both the council and the religious courts were exclusively controlled by the Orthodox rabbinical establishment, which applied the strictest interpretations of Jewish law in those areas of public life where religious law was the law of the state. Despite the fact that the other two main branches of Judaism, Conservative and Reform, had more followers within Israel than the Orthodox community, their rabbis were excluded from presiding over several basic religious ceremonies. Thus, for example, the only marriages recognized as legal in Israel were those performed by Orthodox rabbis. Similarly, conversions to Judaism within Israel were not recognized unless they were performed within the Orthodox religious framework. Although less than a third of Israelis regularly observed Orthodox practices, the authority of the Orthodox rabbinical establishment to decide the most sensitive personal status issues extended to the entire population.

The state's religious basis was further enforced by measures that granted Israel's non-Jewish communities—made up mainly of Muslim and Christian Arabs—the right to follow their own laws in matters of personal status. In effect, the Ottoman millet system was reconstituted in judicial matters. But this was not the case in questions of communal designation: Israeli identity cards (until 2005) defined the nationality of their holders as either "Jewish" or "Arab," not as "Israeli." In this instance, nationality was equated with a specific religion for Jewish Israelis and with a specific ethnicity for Israeli Arabs, an ethnicity that had the negative effect of singling them out as non-Jewish.

The influence of the Jewish religious establishment extended to other areas of national life as well. On the Sabbath, interurban public transportation ceased, most restaurants and places of public entertainment closed, the national airline did not operate, and municipal bus systems offered limited service or, in the case of West Jerusalem, none at all. Indeed, the Sabbath was observed in West Jerusalem more rigorously than in Tel Aviv or Haifa. The roads in some of Jerusalem's religious neighborhoods were barricaded against traffic, and residents sometimes threw stones at passing vehicles as a protest against driving, which they viewed as a violation of the Sabbath. In addition, all public institutions, including the military, were required to observe kosher dietary laws. In the realm of public education, the state provided funding for both secular and religious schools; parents then selected the type of education they wished their children to receive. As with other spheres of officially sanctioned religious practices, both the teaching positions in the state religious schools and the right to determine whether food products were properly kosher became the monopoly of the Orthodox establishment.

Among the many factors that enabled a minority in the Israeli population to impose significant portions of its program of religious identity on society as a whole, the most obvious was the country's multiparty system and the demands it created for coalition governments. As already noted, throughout Israel's formative years, a bloc of small religious parties was often essential for the formation of governments and therefore managed to extract a series of concessions from the dominant Mapai Party. Ben-Gurion, like many Zionist leaders of his generation, was convinced that religion and state would eventually separate, and he did not believe his endorsement of portions of the religious parties' platforms would have significant long-term effects. Over the years, however, the concessions Ben-Gurion granted added up to a formidable list of laws and regulations that have institutionalized religion's role in Israeli public life and generated tensions within Israeli society that are persistent, divisive, and intensely political.

Security and Foreign Relations

Israel began its independent statehood with a siege mentality that gave a high priority to issues of defense and security. Surrounded by Arab states that remained technically at war with it and by Arab leaders who made bellicose proclamations about avenging the defeat of 1948, Israeli society devoted a high proportion of its financial and human resources to the rapid buildup of its armed forces. Ben-Gurion proclaimed that to survive, Israel had to become “a nation in arms,” and he set out to make that goal a reality. Because of Israel’s limited population, the state could not afford, financially or socially, to maintain a standing professional army militarily superior to those of its neighbors. It therefore based its military program on a reserve system that permitted a reduction of the armed forces during peaceful interludes and a speedy expansion through full popular mobilization in national emergencies. All Israelis were conscripted into the armed forces at age eighteen: men for three years, women for two. Arab Israelis, ultrareligious Jews, and women with special family responsibilities received exemptions. To maintain reservists in a high state of combat readiness, men remained in the active reserve until their late forties, women until their mid-thirties. Meeting their country’s security and defense needs thus involved most Israelis in a process of military training that shaped the pattern of their civilian lives for years. The system was disruptive to advanced education and civilian career planning, but it was so nearly universal and so widely perceived as necessary to the state’s survival that most Israelis accepted reserve training and mobilization for war as among their commonly shared expectations of life. So pervasive were these expectations that parents, when asked how many children they had, sometimes replied, “We are raising three soldiers.”² Israel’s military achievements became a source of national pride and provided evidence of the state’s determination to survive in hostile surroundings.

In the arena of the Arab-Israeli conflict, Israel’s efficient armed forces were used as an instrument of foreign policy. During the Ben-Gurion era, the doctrine of retaliation in force became embedded in official Israeli thinking. This doctrine, sometimes referred to as “Ben-Gurionism,” was pursued in the belief that the Arab regimes could be persuaded to abandon their hostility to the existence of Israel only by being subjected to constant reminders of Israel's military power. The core principle of Ben-Gurionism was that every Arab act of aggression against Israel would be met by an armed response well out of proportion to the initial act itself. This policy, regularly implemented in the 1950s, continued to be a standard instrument of Israel's diplomacy by force of arms in the ensuing decades. The most extreme example of Ben-Gurionism in action was an Israeli attack on Egyptian positions in the Gaza Strip in February 1955 in which thirty-eight Egyptians were killed and Egypt's military weakness was exposed. But the policy of retaliation in force did not have the result the Israeli leadership intended. Rather than compelling the Arab rulers to sue for peace, it only heightened their suspicions that Israel harbored expansionist ambitions that had to be countered through the acquisition of advanced weapons. Within months of the Gaza Strip raid, Nasser concluded the Czech-Soviet arms agreement (see Chapter 15), which brought the cold war to the heartland of the Middle East.

In international foreign policy, Israel initially adopted a position of neutrality in the US-Soviet global rivalry. However, with the cold war's extension to the entire Middle East and with the Soviet Union's efforts to cement ties to the core Arab states by providing them arms, Israel began to pursue a pro-Western foreign policy with special emphasis on relations with the United States. Ties between the two countries had been close from the very beginning, and they became closer still after the June War. As a result of Israel's outstanding military performance in that conflict, US policymakers came to view Israel as a potential strategic asset to US Middle Eastern policy. The Johnson and Nixon administrations increased the delivery of sophisticated weapons to Israel and raised the level of US economic and military assistance from $77 million in 1968 to $693 million in 1975. The reasoning behind the development of this policy was twofold: First, the United States hoped Israel's absolute military superiority would contribute to regional stability by deterring the Arab states from going to war against Israel, and second, the US cold war mentality envisaged a powerful Israel acting as a barrier to Soviet expansionism in the Middle East. There is little evidence that US expectations were fulfilled: Israeli actions occasionally compromised US strategic interests, Israel's readiness to deploy its armed forces in pursuit of its own security objectives was not a stabilizing factor in the region, and Syria and Iraq followed Egypt's lead in forming military partnerships with the USSR. Nevertheless, successive US administrations continued to provide ever more generous assistance to Israel, to offer diplomatic backing at the United Nations, and to deepen what has become known as the “special relationship” between the two countries, a relationship that has not been grounded in a formal treaty of alliance but that is nonetheless a fixture of US policy.

THE ELECTIONS OF 1977: ISRAEL IN TRANSITION

In the decade from 1967 to 1977, two closely interconnected factors combined to produce a significant change in Israeli political alignments and national priorities. The first was the effect of the continued occupation of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip on Israeli and Palestinian society (see the next section). The second factor, made possible by the first, was the surprising outcome of the Israeli elections held in May 1977.

These elections, variously referred to as “the revolt of the Sephardim” or “Israel’s earthquake elections,” transformed the balance of political power in Israel. In a reversal of the voting patterns that had existed since 1948, the electorate entrusted a right-of-center coalition, the Likud bloc, and its leader, Menachem Begin, with the task of forming a government. Israel’s new prime minister was a proponent of revisionist Zionism and had headed the extreme nationalist terrorist organization Irgun from 1943 to 1948 (see Chapter 13). After Israel’s founding and the disbandment of Irgun, Begin was elected to the Knesset as the leading spokesman of the small ultranationalist party known as Herut. With its demand for the creation of Greater Israel on both banks of the Jordan River, Herut was for several years little more than a militant fringe party. However, in 1974, Herut broadened its popular base by forming a political coalition with other, more centrist parties. Its electoral victory in 1977 elevated Begin, the quintessential outsider, to the apex of Israeli political power.

Begin’s election was due in considerable measure to support from the other outsiders of Israeli society, the Sephardic community. Bitter at their exclusion from mainstream Israeli life and angered over their social and economic marginalization, the Sephardic Jews lashed out at the establishment by voting in large numbers for Begin. The Labor Party, which was the name taken by Mapai after it merged with two smaller parties in 1968, also contributed to Likud's victory. After nearly thirty years in power, Labor had become a stale and bloated bureaucratic party subject to charges of nepotism and corruption. The Israeli public concluded it was time for a change.

So substantial was the political and social reorientation represented by the election of Begin and Likud that some scholars refer to the years from 1977 to the present as "the second Israel." The Begin years (1977–1983) appeared to mark the beginning of a new era in Israeli history, one in which a highly charged tone of religious militancy replaced the secular socialist Zionism that had dominated the mandate and early statehood periods. Although Begin did not create this atmosphere of religious resurgence, he was in accord with it and used it to further his own political agenda—an agenda primarily focused on retaining the territories occupied during the June War.

THE PALESTINIAN FACTOR AFTER 1948

The Palestinian Diaspora Community

The 1948–1949 exodus of the Arab population from the parts of Palestine that fell within the borders of Israel created a refugee problem of immense proportions (see Chapter 13). In 1950, the United Nations registered 960,000 Palestinians for relief. As a result of natural population increase and the displacements caused by the June War, the number of refugees rose to 1.3 million in 1968. The refugees lived in makeshift camps located primarily in Jordan, Lebanon, Syria, and the Gaza Strip. The camps had been set up as temporary shelters pending a solution to the refugee problem. The solution envisaged at the time was the repatriation of the refugees to the areas from which they had fled. However, actions taken by the Israeli government in the years immediately following 1948 made this an unlikely prospect. The Israeli authorities, faced with a surge of Jewish immigration that totaled more than 600,000 individuals between 1948 and 1951, took over vacant Palestinian villages, urban dwellings, and farmland to house and feed the immigrants. The absorption of Palestinian land and property into the Israeli economy made it next to impossible for Israel to consider the repatriation of the Palestinians.

Destitute and uprooted, the majority of Palestinian refugees had no alternative to the miseries of camp life. To be sure, those with wealth, family connections, or employable skills were able to reestablish themselves in other Arab states, Europe, and North America. For example, Palestinians found jobs in the expanding economies of the oil-producing Gulf states and formed prosperous communities of business people, administrators, and technocrats. However, most of the refugees were rural sharecroppers or peasant proprietors who had fled their land and their homes and left behind most of their family possessions. They were sustained by the United Nations Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA), which was founded in 1950 to oversee the welfare of the camps. The agency was overwhelmed by the magnitude of the relief task it faced. Its budget was so strained that it could provide an average annual expenditure of only twenty-seven dollars per individual for food, shelter, clothing, and medical services. For the refugees, living quarters consisted of shacks made of flattened petrol cans or tents in which extended families resided without privacy. Over time, many camps took on more permanent features and came to resemble villages, with concrete block dwellings, schools, and a few economic enterprises. Far from real villages, they were degrading habitations of people on the international dole, people deprived of work, freedom, and, it appeared, a future.

It must be appreciated that this bleak situation was forced upon the majority of the refugees by circumstances. Denied repatriation to Israel, they were dependent on opportunities the host countries made available to them, which varied from country to country. Restrictions on employment and freedom of movement were harshest in Egypt and Lebanon. For example, Palestinians registered as refugees in the Gaza Strip were not allowed into other parts of Egypt. In Syria, Iraq, and Jordan, Palestinians were allowed to work and open businesses. The host countries had a shortage of cultivable land and a surplus of unskilled labor and could not absorb masses of uprooted Palestinian peasants. In addition, the host governments feared that Palestinian political activities would bring Israeli retaliation; they therefore viewed the Palestinians with suspicion and prohibited them from forming political organizations.

In these circumstances, it was almost impossible for the refugees from rural backgrounds to break out of their cycle of dependency. Some found seasonal agricultural employment, others worked as street vendors, and still others were employed at low wages in the construction industry within their host country. But mostly they remained trapped in a vicious set of circumstances. The Arab host governments did not wish them to remain on their soil as refugees, but at the same time these governments would not grant them the opportunities that would release them from their refugee status. Their lack of integration into their host societies and their confinement to the camps served to keep alive their identity as Palestinians and to nurture the idea that only a return to Palestine could terminate their refugee status.

The situation in Jordan was somewhat different from that in the other host countries. There the Palestinians were granted citizenship, and many found employment—and middle-class status—as civil servants in the government. Those who prospered in Jordan became the core of a post-1948 Palestinian exile bourgeoisie, emotionally committed to the ideal of the return to Palestine but practically devoted to the niceties of middle-class existence.

In the period between 1948 and 1967, many Palestinian exiles placed their hopes for repatriation on outside forces. Groups of Palestinian intellectuals in Beirut endorsed various strains of Marxism, Ba'thism, and Pan-Arabism in the belief that the application of these doctrines would benefit the Palestinian cause by regenerating Arab society as a whole. Many others placed their faith in Nasser as the leader most likely to bring about Palestine's liberation. But these were non-Palestinian solutions to the Palestine question; they tied the recovery of Palestine to external Arab regimes and outside ideologies. Even the most specifically Palestinian organization of the time was little more than an instrument of the Arab states. The PLO was founded in 1964 under the auspices of the Arab League. Its creation represented an attempt by the Arab states to restrict Palestinian resistance activity and to prevent the Palestinian movement from operating independently. The PLO was based in Cairo, where Nasser's security agencies closely scrutinized it. The Arab governments selected Ahmad Shuqayri, a lawyer from one of Palestine's established notable families, to chair the organization. The majority of the PLO's executive council were, like Shuqayri, from the traditional Palestinian notability, thus their lives as exiles were far removed from the brutal experiences of the refugee camps.

The Impact of the June War

The June War profoundly altered Palestinian circumstances and attitudes. Not only had the Arab states failed to liberate Palestine; they had managed to lose additional areas of Palestinian territory to Israel. Disillusioned with the Arab leadership, groups of Palestinian activists concluded that Palestinians would have to assume the responsibility for liberating their homeland. The Arab defeat in 1967 was the catalyst that transformed the PLO from a body of Cairo-based bureaucratic notables into an independent resistance organization devoted to armed struggle against Israel.

In the immediate aftermath of the June War, several small Palestinian guerrilla organizations became active in the Gaza Strip and Jordan. The most successful was al-Fatah, an organization headed by Yasir Arafat. Al-Fatah was formed in the late 1950s by a group of young Palestinian university graduates working in Kuwait. After 1967, it moved its operations to Jordan, where it enjoyed considerable success in recruiting, training, and deploying the flood of Palestinian youths attracted to the guerrilla groups. Al-Fatah rapidly emerged as the most formidable of the independent commando organizations, and in 1969, Arafat was elected chair of the PLO executive committee. The PLO was not a single entity but rather an umbrella organization under whose authority several different and often fractious resistance groups coexisted. Arafat, as head of the largest group, was able to build coalitions that endorsed his chairmanship of the entire organization from 1969 to his death in 2004.

From its very beginnings, al-Fatah adopted a straightforward ideology that emphasized Palestinian nationalism above all else. Its founders avoided tying the cause of Palestine to such doctrines as communism, Ba'thism, and Pan-Arabism. They stressed the basic objective of recovering the Palestinian homeland and linked the modern resistance movement to such historic Palestinian episodes as the 1936–1939 uprising. This Palestinian-centered focus cut across religious and class lines and provided an appealing and readily comprehensible message to a broad cross-section of Palestinians. In this way, the al-Fatah/PLO leadership succeeded in restoring the Palestinian dimension to the Arab-Israeli conflict and in forging a Palestinian national identity.

Al-Fatah also affirmed the necessity of armed resistance in the struggle to recover Palestine. A further constant in the al-Fatah/PLO position was the decision not to endorse UN Resolution 242. This refusal reflected two considerations: First, the resolution recognized Israel's right to exist, and second, it mentioned the Palestinians only as a refugee problem, not as a people with a right to a national homeland. Over the years, the reality of Israeli power produced certain modifications in the PLO's position. In 1974, the goal of liberating all of Palestine was dropped in favor of creating a Palestinian state comprising the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. This new position implied but did not directly admit Israel's right to exist. Finally, in 1988, the PLO endorsed Resolution 242 and accepted the existence of the state of Israel in its pre-1967 boundaries.

As defined in the Palestinian National Charter of the PLO, the new Palestine was to comprise the whole area of mandate Palestine and to be a democratic, non-sectarian state that would recognize and give equal status to all religions. In short, the charter denied the specifically Jewish character of Israel. It is not surprising that Israelis found the document threatening and used it as evidence to support their claim that the PLO stood for the Israeli state's destruction.

An additional reason for the ongoing prominence of the al-Fatah bloc within the PLO was its continuity of leadership. Four of the group's core founders from the 1950s were still at the center of PLO power in the early 1980s, and other early members remained on al-Fatah's executive committee. The cohesiveness of al-Fatah's founders derived in part from their shared background and experiences. Most were part of the 1948 exodus and had direct experience of refugee life. They also had enough talent and ambition to escape the camps—all but one of the individuals who participated in al-Fatah activities in the mid-1960s were university graduates. Arafat (1929–2004), for example, obtained an engineering degree from Cairo University, where he was also instrumental in founding a Palestinian Student Union. For Arafat and his colleagues, service to the cause of Palestine occupied most of their adult lives and gave them a credibility within the Palestinian community that the traditional notables lacked. Indeed, when al-Fatah took over the PLO in 1969, the occasion marked the final transfer of Palestinian leadership from the established notability to a new group of fulltime activists.

Al-Fatah was not the only group within the PLO. Among the other commando organizations, the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP) and the Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine (DFLP) represented challenges to the al-Fatah/PLO mainstream position. Although they never seriously threatened al-Fatah's political dominance, they often embarrassed the PLO by rejecting its directives and resorting to independent terrorist activities. The PFLP grew out of a pro-Nasser organization active in Beirut in the late 1950s and early 1960s. Headed by a Palestinian Orthodox Christian physician, George Habash, the organization was more committed to linking the Palestinian movement to the cause of social revolution in the Arab world than it was to al-Fatah. The DFLP, under the leadership of Nayif Hawatmah, also an Orthodox Christian, was to the political left of the al-Fatah mainstream; it believed workers and peasants should be the main participants and beneficiaries of the Palestinian movement.

As the PLO gradually acquired the characteristics of a government in exile during the 1970s, it developed a complex network of committees and agencies that provided social services to Palestinians. The PLO operated schools and medical clinics in the refugee camps and managed a Lebanese-based manufacturing conglomerate. In addition, the PLO undertook diplomatic initiatives in its drive to win acceptance as the legitimate representative of the Palestinian people. Within the Arab world, this goal was achieved at an Arab summit meeting in Rabat in 1974, during which the PLO received recognition as the sole representative of the Palestinians. Later the same year, Arafat addressed the General Assembly of the United Nations, and the PLO was granted observer status in that body. In 1975, France authorized the opening of a PLO information office in Paris, and most other Western European governments soon did the same. Austria took this development one step further in 1980 by according the PLO full diplomatic recognition. Despite its diplomatic successes elsewhere, the PLO was unable to obtain any sort of public recognition from the United States until 1988.

The Failure to Secure a Base of Operations: Black September 1970

The emergence of the guerrilla organizations after the June War provided evidence that the Palestinian cause was being kept alive by the actions of Palestinians themselves. Thousands of young Palestinians sought to escape the dreary refugee camps by joining the organizations, and in those heady months, the aura of activism that had once been symbolized by Nasser was transferred to the Palestinian guerrillas. In search of a heroic historical model suitable to their circumstances, the commandos pointed to the 1954–1962 Algerian revolution against France as an example of how a determined nationalist resistance could overcome seemingly hopeless odds. However, the Palestinian resistance operated in vastly different circumstances than had the Algerian or other successful national liberation movements. The Palestinians were external to the land they hoped to liberate; they therefore required a base of operations in one of the Arab states bordering Israel. The governments of these countries, though, could hardly be expected to welcome bands of armed guerrillas determined to operate independently and to conduct military action against Israel.

The clash between the commandos' desire to establish an independent base of operations and an established government's need to maintain its domestic authority was most acute in Jordan. The post-1967 concentration of guerrilla organizations in that country posed a direct challenge to King Husayn. By 1970, the commandos were operating independently of the king's authority, establishing their own administrative networks in the refugee camps, conducting raids into Israel that provoked the usual Israeli reprisals, and generally behaving as though their organizations were exempt from Jordanian jurisdiction. The tension reached the breaking point in September, when the PFLP hijacked four civilian airliners and landed three of them in a part of Jordan it defined as "liberated territory." As the Jordanian army stood helplessly by, the PFLP threatened to blow up the planes and kill the hostages if any attempt was made to interfere. The PFLP's flaunting of its independence from the government presented King Husayn with two unpleasant options: He had to either break the guerrillas' power or tolerate the further erosion of his authority and a probable Palestinian takeover of his kingdom. As he had done on previous occasions, the king chose to preserve his throne.

On September 15, 1970, the Jordanian army was commanded to restore order. Thus began the ten-day carnage known as Black September, during which the Jordanian military directed all the force at its disposal against the Palestinian presence in the country. Making no distinction between civilians and armed guerrillas, the Jordanian troops bombarded the refugee camps in and around Amman and relentlessly pursued the commando groups throughout the country. When a ceasefire was finally arranged on September 25, more than 3,000 Palestinians had been killed. The events of Black September brought home to Palestinians the extent of their isolation in the Middle East; Israel was not the only state in which they were unwanted.

In the years immediately following Black September, against a backdrop of international terrorism carried out by Palestinian organizations made desperate by the failure to achieve their political objectives in the Middle East, the PLO transferred its organizational base to Lebanon. Throughout the early 1970s, Palestinian groups, some of them members of the PLO, carried out a series of airliner hijackings, airport massacres, and suicide missions into Israel. The most notorious of these actions was the ghastly 1972 Munich episode, in which members of the Israeli Olympic team were taken hostage and killed during the rescue attempt. At the same time, the Israeli government conducted operations against Palestinian leaders in Europe and Beirut, and the Israeli air force killed scores of people in Jordan and Lebanon during its frequent raids.

Meanwhile, the PLO was able to recover from Black September and reconstitute itself in Lebanon. Chapter 18 discusses the impact of the PLO's activities on Lebanese society.

Israel and the Palestinians in the Occupied Territories

While activist organizations among the Palestinian exiles engaged in armed resistance and formed communal assistance groups from bases outside Israel, the Palestinian population of the West Bank and Gaza Strip lived under an Israeli occupation regime that controlled its existence and shaped its development. The West Bank comprised 2,270 square miles and was inhabited in late 1967 by an estimated 596,000 Palestinian Arabs. The Gaza Strip was only 140 square miles in size, but into it were crowded nearly 350,000 Palestinians, most of them refugees. Israeli success in capturing the territories raised thorny questions for Israeli authorities about the land and its inhabitants. For security reasons, the Israeli military regarded the retention of at least a portion of the territories as essential. Official Israeli political circles at the time believed that most of the occupied lands would eventually be returned in exchange for peace agreements with the Arab states. However, Jewish religious organizations viewed the territories—especially the West Bank, which they referred to by its biblical names, Judea and Samaria—as part of the historic land of Israel and claimed that Israel had a duty to retain them for the Jewish people. But if the territories were to be retained, how were their Arab inhabitants to be treated? On the one hand, if they were granted Israeli citizenship, they would dilute the Jewish character of the state and, with their higher birthrates, eventually make up a majority of the Israeli population. On the other hand, to deny them citizenship was to accept the proposition that they were to be treated as a permanently occupied people deprived of basic human rights.

Rather than making clear-cut decisions on these matters, successive Israeli governments from 1967 to 1977 maintained the military occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip and launched a settlement policy designed to establish a Jewish presence in strategically important border areas along the Jordan River (see Map 17.1). Although Israel annexed Arab East Jerusalem in 1967, the Israeli government was not yet committed to a policy of retaining all of the occupied territories and claimed that land might be exchanged for peace. This element of compromise was eliminated with the election of Begin and the Likud bloc in 1977.

The election of Likud coincided with the rise of a religious settlers' movement. In Begin this movement found a prime minister who was publicly committed to annexing the occupied territories. Begin brought the question of the retention of these lands to the forefront of Israeli politics and permitted organizations favoring increased settlement activities to acquire influence in government and society. At the heart of Begin's strategy was a policy of establishing Jewish settlements throughout the West Bank and Gaza Strip. When he assumed office, there were 24 settlements inhabited by 3,200 persons; at his resignation six years later, the numbers had increased to 106 settlements and 28,400 settlers. To encourage Israeli migration to the occupied territories, the Begin government introduced a suburban settlement policy designed to appeal to commuters from Tel Aviv and Jerusalem. The state built comfortable, low-cost housing to lure to the West Bank white-collar workers who might not be drawn to agricultural settlements. Begin sought to create such a large and dedicated Jewish presence in the occupied territories that no future government could possibly relinquish its hold over them.

The settlement policy adopted after 1977 also aimed to break up and isolate areas of heavy Arab concentration. This tactic was pioneered by a militant religious organization called Gush Emunim (the Bloc of the Faithful), which began to establish illegal settlements on Arab-owned land in the mid-1970s. The Begin government endorsed Gush Emunim's actions and encouraged it and other groups to settle in predominantly Arab centers. The settlement policy was thus used as an instrument to divide Arab society into isolated segments and to prevent the emergence of a collective Palestinian identity.

The land needed for the settlements was acquired in various ways. The military administration that governed the occupied territories used its authority to appropriate private Arab land for security purposes. In 1980, the Begin government declared that unregistered and uncultivated land would be classified as state land to be dealt with as the Israeli authorities saw fit. This measure took advantage of the confused West Bank land regime that existed in the wake of Ottoman, British, and Jordanian rule, giving the Israeli government the legal pretext to acquire 500,000 acres on the West Bank, slightly more than 40 percent of the total land area. In addition, 30 percent of the Gaza Strip was transferred to Israeli state ownership by the early 1980s.

MAP 17.1. Israeli settlements on the West Bank, 1967–1987.

The economic component of Begin's annexationist strategy consisted of an attempt to link the economies of Israel and the occupied territories. Palestinians from the territories were employed as laborers within Israel proper, especially in construction. Although their wages and benefits were low by Israeli standards, they were relatively high by the standards of the territories. The economic well-being of individual West Bank Arabs increased under the occupation, but due to wages earned within Israel, not to improvements in the West Bank economy. Thus, the territories' inhabitants became dependent on work from Israeli employers. At the same time, the Israeli authorities imposed measures to prevent the territories from achieving their own independent economic development. For example, import duties were levied on some agricultural products brought into Israel from the West Bank, but Israeli growers faced no such barriers for their produce in the territories.

To gain political control of the Palestinians under occupation, the Israeli military administration imprisoned or deported hundreds of activists and tried to break the spirit of those who remained. Collective punishment, house arrest, and the closure of business establishments were but a few of the sentences meted out to the Arab population. The repressive government policies were compounded by the aggressive actions of settlers who practiced their own brand of vigilante justice. The net effect of the Israeli occupation was the simultaneous demoralization and radicalization of the Arab inhabitants of the West Bank and Gaza Strip. On the one hand, they were fearful they would lose their land and alarmed at their apparent abandonment by the international community. On the other hand, they were made defiant by the policies of an Israeli government that left resistance as the only alternative to annexation. In these circumstances, they turned to the one external body that had consistently acted on their behalf: the PLO. By the late 1970s, links had been forged between the PLO and the inhabitants of the occupied territories, and Arafat had become accepted as the spokesman of the Palestinians of the West Bank and Gaza Strip as well as of the refugees and exiles in the Arab countries.

CONCLUSION

Despite Israel's diplomatic isolation in the Middle East and despite the stresses, strains, and contradictions within Israeli society itself, the new state managed to forge an identity, construct a stable democratic political system, maintain an effective military capability, and secure the loyalty and participation of its Jewish citizens in the unique enterprise of building a Jewish nation. However, Menachem Begin's election in 1977 propelled Israel in a new, uncharted direction: It ushered in government-supported currents of Jewish religious militancy that called into question the assumptions of Ben-Gurion and other founders of labor Zionism and created divisions within Israeli society that were more pronounced than had previously existed. In the intense political struggle to determine the Jewish state's future direction, ultranationalism and religious fervor appeared to be in the ascendancy.

The emergence of an armed and organized Palestinian resistance movement after 1967 renewed the Palestinians' sense of themselves as a distinct national entity deserving of the same recognition as Israel. Yet at the same time, Palestinian militancy sharpened political divisions among the Arab states upon whose support the resistance movement ultimately depended. Although the leaders of the Arab states expressed support for the Palestinian cause, they were reluctant to offer sanctuary to the commando organizations. The example of Jordan from 1969 to 1970 was a vivid reminder that the presence of Palestinian activists posed a threat to the existing Arab regimes. Yet without a secure base from which to conduct operations into Israel, the Palestinian guerrilla organizations would have no legitimacy. In the aftermath of the Black September massacres in Jordan, the PLO found an ideal sanctuary in Lebanon. However, that country proved to be a fragile safe haven (see Chapter 18).

At the same time, the PLO was successful in building support among the inhabitants of the occupied West Bank. Perhaps the principal achievement of the Palestinians' resistance was to create a Palestinian consciousness, as a distinctive people entitled to basic human rights, that was too deeply rooted to be eliminated by the brute force of Israeli occupation policies. But it was also noteworthy that in the process of discovering their own feelings of national identity, the Palestinians had awakened the international community to the realization that, at its core, the Arab-Israeli conflict was a matter between the state of Israel and the Palestinian people. Until the two parties central to the dispute recognized this basic reality and agreed to negotiate their differences, there would be no resolution of the conflict.

PART FIVE

THE RESURGENCE OF ISLAM

The Middle East from the 1970s to the 1991 Gulf War

The patterns of Middle Eastern history began to take new directions in the early 1970s. No single organizing theme can accurately embrace the diversity and disruptiveness of these emergent historical trends, but one of the most far-reaching developments was the unexpected resurgence of Islamic-based political activity and protest. In the first two decades after World War II, Western development theorists assumed that the Middle East—and the rest of the developing world—would become increasingly secular as they became increasingly modern. Yet even as the role of the ulama declined and the jurisdiction of the shari‘ah was limited, the Islamic sensibilities of the population as a whole remained intact. When the imported ideologies of the independence era failed to bring economic well-being to society at large, a current of Islamic revivalism came into existence. Its most dramatic manifestation was the Iranian revolution of 1979, but it was—and remains—a persistent feature of the political life of every Islamic country and figures prominently in the study of the past forty years of Middle Eastern history.

Partly responsible for the appearance of Islamist politics was a second pattern characterizing this period: Authoritarian regimes, often dominated by the same individual for long periods of time, became the norm in most of the Arab states and Iran. Under these regimes, the power of the central state and its machinery of control increased markedly. In the course of enhancing their power and security, authoritarian rulers in Iran, Egypt, Syria, Iraq, and the Arabian Peninsula—and the military in democratic Turkey—took measures to silence leftist opposition forces. Such measures limited the available channels through which the population could express its grievances over economic mismanagement, the maldistribution of wealth, the absence of democracy, and the general failure of the regimes to satisfy popular aspirations and needs. Islamic organizations constituted one of the few remaining avenues of protest.

A third development during these years was the revolution in petroleum prices and the resulting expansion of the regional influence of such petroleum giants as Kuwait and Saudi Arabia. During the Arab-Israeli war of 1973, the Arab oil-producing states introduced an oil boycott on Western consuming nations. The boycott caused the cost of oil to soar and sped up negotiations that enabled oil producers to acquire marketing and pricing control of the precious resource on which the West was dependent. As the price of oil increased precipitously, dire predictions were made about the collapse of the Western and Japanese economies. However, the industrialized nations were willing to pay whatever the market would bear. Access to oil, not its price, became the driving force behind the West's policies toward the oil-producing states. To ensure access, the West, led by the United States, sought to shore up the friendly monarchies that ruled most of the major oil-producing states and to preserve the political status quo in the Persian Gulf. In Saudi Arabia—the major Arab oil producer and home of the holy sites of Mecca and Medina—the royal family's association with the strict creed of Wahhabi Islam remained its principal legitimizing factor.

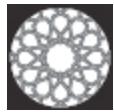

A fourth pattern that emerged during this period was a growing tension in the relations within and among Middle Eastern states. This period opened with the longest of the Arab-Israeli wars and continued with Israel's invasion of Lebanon and siege of Beirut and the bloody eight-year war between Iraq and Iran. Egypt's peace with Israel transformed the configuration of the Arab state system; the preeminent Arab army was withdrawn from the confrontation with Israel and the leading Arab state was expelled from the Arab League. In these circumstances, Syria and Iraq made bids for regional dominance and, in the process, became bitter rivals.

Iraq's ambition led it to invade and annex Kuwait, a neighboring Arab state, and resulted in several other Arab states' joining the military coalition that waged war against Iraq. Internal violence was exemplified in the civil war that engulfed Lebanon for fifteen years. The reasons for such violence do not constitute some sort of exclusively Middle Eastern form of irrationality; they can be understood within the context of the historical patterns that emerged in part as a legacy of the June 1967 war and in part as a response to the clash of nationalisms and the competition for dominance within a regional state system. These historical patterns are not isolated from one another; rather, they represent parts of a complex, interrelated set of developments whose causes are evident and comprehensible. The same cause-and-effect relationships operate in the Middle East as elsewhere in the world. Recognizing the new patterns and the changes they represent or the elements of continuity they contain may place in perspective the specific events discussed in this section of the book and make causal relationships more visible.

CHAPTER 18

THE IRANIAN REVOLUTION AND THE REVIVAL OF ISLAM

The Iranian revolution of 1979 was profoundly significant not only for Iran but also for the Middle East as a whole, for Islamic states throughout the world, and for outside powers dealing with the Middle East. Within Iran, the revolution has been called “a cataclysmic event” that transformed the country’s political, social, economic, and legal structure.¹ It overthrew the shah and led to the establishment of a republic, it replaced secular laws with Islamic codes of law, and it ousted the shah’s hand-picked political and military leaders and set up a new elite.

The success of the revolution provided encouragement to those Muslims who were disenchanted with Western models of development and longed for a restoration of Islamic institutions through which they hoped a prosperous and positive future could be built. But the rulers of Middle Eastern states did not share in the popular euphoria the revolution generated. The emergence in Iran of a militant Islamic Republic caused tremors among conservative monarchs and secular dictators alike, and Iran became isolated in the Middle East. And finally, the revolution destroyed the foundations on which US policy in the Persian Gulf had been built. The shah was the United States’ strongest ally in the oil-rich Gulf; he received billions of dollars’ worth of US arms in order to enable his country to protect US interests and to discourage Soviet adventurism. With the onset of the revolution, Iran's military arsenal came into the hands of a regime that renounced its ties with the United States, condemned Israel, and pledged to eradicate US influence in the region. During the decade after 1979, the United States' attempts to recover its position were awkward and bumbling, tending to worsen rather than improve its relationship with the new forces emerging from the revolution.

THE STAGES OF REVOLUTION IN IRAN

Stirrings of Opposition

In 1975, Muhammad Reza Shah's regime took steps to further consolidate its control over the lives of the Iranian people by abandoning the existing two-party system and introducing a single political organization, the Resurgence Party. Through the Resurgence Party and its affiliated organizations, the regime attempted to gain control of groups that had managed to retain a certain degree of autonomy from the government, especially the bazaar merchants and the ulama. The government tried to force the party apparatus into the bazaars and attacked the religious establishment by reducing the role of Islam in daily life and glorifying the monarchy at the expense of Islamic norms of identity. For example, in a provocative move that challenged the role of Islam, the shah replaced the Islamic calendar with a royal calendar that dated from the reign of Cyrus the Great. Such measures antagonized both the bazaar merchants and the religious establishment and activated the traditional alliance between them. Yet the government's totalitarian control of society appeared to be so all-embracing as to provide a secure foundation for the perpetuation of the monarchy.

However, cracks in the structure of royal absolutism were evident even in the period of its greatest strength. Economic management was one of the regime's failings. Following the dramatic rise in oil prices in 1973 and 1974, the government indulged in wasteful spending that generated runaway inflation and showed the extent to which the benefits of the oil wealth were unevenly distributed. On the one hand, privileged factions within Iranian society—developers, certain business people, and the intermediaries who arranged contracts with foreign firms—made vast fortunes during the 1970s. The shah’s family and their retainers skimmed millions of dollars from the national wealth to support their lavish style of living. On the other hand, an inflationary spiral sent the cost of living for the urban middle classes soaring and threatened their economic livelihood. The first public expressions of discontent came from members of this group.

The shah’s reliance on foreign experts was another cause of popular opposition to his regime. With the purchase of advanced weapons systems and the inauguration of large-scale development projects, the regime was compelled to recruit ever-increasing numbers of foreign technicians and military advisers; by 1977, there were more than 60,000 of them in the country. To a broad cross-section of Iranian opinion, the presence of so many non-Muslim foreigners acted as a constant reminder of the shah’s rush to copy the West and his dependence on the agents of Western imperialism. Slogans denouncing the shah’s ties to the West would become prominent during the months of revolutionary protest.

A channel for expressing grievances opened up in 1977 when human rights organizations such as Amnesty International publicized the Iranian regime’s violations of human rights and its use of torture on political prisoners. With the inauguration of President Carter in 1977, the US administration pressured the shah to liberalize his regime. The shah, not wanting to jeopardize his relationship with Washington and his access to US military equipment, relaxed police controls, introduced court reforms for the trials of political dissidents, and released some 300 political prisoners. This modest shift in the regime’s policies emboldened the opposition to speak out.

The leading voices in the first public dissent were the Westernized urban professionals and students from the new secular universities. They were joined by groups from the traditional sector of urban society—namely, bazaar merchants and students from the theological seminaries. Forming themselves into professional associations and student organizations, the protesters published pamphlets and distributed manifestos criticizing the regime’s violation of human rights and demanding freedom of press and assembly. With mounting published criticism of the regime, the opposition escalated its activities by resurrecting old political organizations and forming new ones, of which the two most important were the Freedom Movement of Iran and the militant wing of the ulama.

Mehdi Bazargan (1907–1995), who founded the Freedom Movement in 1961, was representative of the liberal opposition forces that rallied to his organization. Educated as an engineer in Paris, Bazargan was a reformist politician who had supported Mosaddiq against the shah in the early 1950s. Although Bazargan believed Iran should have a secular government, he did not advocate the abandonment of Islam. He saw Islam as a vital component of Iran's national culture and opposed the shah's relentless pursuit of Western values. Bazargan insisted that Islam itself was a reformist ideology and that it should be incorporated into a modernization program that was progressive yet distinctly Iranian. During the first phase of the revolution, Bazargan and his colleagues favored restoring the 1906 constitution and establishing a constitutional monarchy headed by the shah. They saw that change was coming to Iran, and they expected to play a leading role in determining its direction. But they would be disappointed.

The most influential ideologue in Bazargan's wing of the Freedom Movement was Paris-educated intellectual Ali Shari‘ati (1933–1977), a teacher whose contributions to the protest movement of the 1970s were of the utmost significance. While studying for his doctorate in Paris, Shari‘ati participated in student politics and immersed himself in the works of Jean-Paul Sartre, Frantz Fanon, and Che Guevara, among others. Upon his return to Iran, his radical outlook made it difficult for him to secure a teaching position, and he eventually became a lecturer at a religious meeting hall in Tehran. The lectures he delivered between his appointment in 1967 and his arrest in 1972 were circulated widely.

Influenced by the achievements of the Algerian and Cuban revolutions but totally opposed to the secularism associated with those movements, Shari‘ati advanced a reformist doctrine that brought together an unlikely combination of Marxism, Shi‘ism, revolutionism, and Iranian patriotism. The core of his message was that Shi‘ism was an activist faith that required its adherents to oppose injustice and to assert their cultural heritage in the face of Western models of development. His doctrines had a religious orientation but showed no sympathy to those members of the ulama who practiced a stagnant religious scholasticism. In Shari‘ati's view, the apolitical ulama failed to recognize the essence of Shi‘a Islam as represented by Ali and Husayn, the historical Imams who achieved martyrdom in their struggles against the oppressors of their era. Shari‘ati proposed a kind of “secular faith” that was dynamic, challenging, and inspiring; it called for action and for change, yet it was anchored in the culturally familiar framework of Shi‘a Islam. Denouncing the censorship, secularism, and corruption of the shah’s regime in the mid-1970s, Shari‘ati’s call for action was immensely popular among high school and university students in that it provided them with “an ideology that fulfilled both their desire to remain loyal to their faith and their urge to undertake a revolution.”² Shari‘ati’s mysterious death in London in 1977 was attributed to SAVAK and added to his luster as a martyr for the cause he had so passionately and persuasively advocated. As revealed in the writings and beliefs of Bazargan and Shari‘ati, there existed a strong current of Islamic-oriented activism among the lay political and intellectual figures associated with the Freedom Movement.

The professional religious establishment did not have a common plan of action toward the shah’s regime. Indeed, a large section of leading ulama believed it was not the clergy’s place to partake in political activities. A second group was composed of moderate reformers whose objectives generally accorded with those of Bazargan and the Freedom Movement—the restoration of the constitution and the establishment of a constitutional monarchy under the shah. A third wing within the religious establishment was more militant and more intransigent. Discontent with the simple rearrangement of government that the restoration of the constitution would bring about, its members demanded fundamental change by calling for the overthrow of the monarchy and the creation of an Islamic state controlled by the ulama. This group was led by Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, the central figure in the revolution and the inspirational force whose uncompromising stance and skillful blending of ideologies drew all the opposition forces to his side.

Khomeini (1902–1989) was trained at the Islamic seminary in Qum and then became an instructor there. He distrusted the policies of Reza Shah and his son, believing that both monarchs were determined to break the power of the ulama and to secularize Iranian society. In 1963, Khomeini was arrested for publicly accusing the shah of introducing policies incompatible with the principles of Islam. After his release, he continued to criticize the regime and was again arrested and exiled to Turkey in 1964 (see Chapter 14). After a year in Turkey, he was permitted to reside in the Shi'a holy city of Najaf in Iraq, remaining there until his removal to the suburbs of Paris in 1978.

During his exile, he continued to speak out against the shah and his government. The lectures and sermons he delivered in Iraq were recorded, and the tapes were smuggled into Iran, where they circulated widely and kept Khomeini's name in the public eye as one of the most outspoken opponents of the regime. Khomeini's statements acquired credibility not only because of his courageous stand but also because he had maintained a network of former students who, in the 1960s and 1970s, rose to positions of prominence in the Iranian religious establishment. His well-placed disciples disseminated his various proclamations and prevented Khomeini's exile from isolating him from the Iranian people.

One of Khomeini's most persistent charges was that the shah was selling Iran to foreign, especially US, interests and that this was tantamount to the destruction of Iran's Islamic identity. Khomeini's proposals for resolving the ills Iran was suffering under the shah were contained in a series of lectures published in 1971 as a book, Vilayati-i Faqih: Hukumat-i Islami (Government of the Islamic Jurist). One scholar has argued that the work was more than a guide for the reorganization of society; it was also "a handbook for revolution."³ In it, Khomeini argued that an Islamic state modeled on the Quran and the community of the Prophet could realistically be created and that the men of religion, because of their knowledge of Islamic law, should manage the affairs of state. Khomeini further argued that the institution of monarchy was alien to Islam, and he called for the overthrow of the shah's regime through the creation of a parallel Islamic government that would mobilize the population to rise up against injustice and tyranny.

The Freedom Movement and other elements of the opposition who hoped for a more secular government did not fully accept Khomeini's demand for the shah's ouster and the establishment of a government run by the ulama. However, as the revolution gained momentum, Khomeini's program attracted a growing measure of support. His form of religiously based political activism transcended generations and classes because it was embedded in Iranian society at large. He tapped the shared heritage of religious protest based on anti-imperial sentiments that had its roots in the 1891 tobacco protest, the constitutional revolution of 1905–1911, and the resistance that Khomeini himself had offered in 1963.

From Protest to Revolution

The year 1978 marked the opposition's transformation from a moderate reformist movement of the professional middle classes to a popular Islamic revolution inspired by Khomeini and supported by the urban masses. The brutal response of the shah's forces to the unarmed protest of the Iranian people hastened the transformation.

In January 1978, an official government newspaper published a scandalous and far-fetched attack on Khomeini. The article prompted students and bazaar merchants in Qum to mount a demonstration denouncing the shah's regime. Army units forcefully broke up the demonstration, killing several students in the process. The deaths at Qum introduced a new dimension to the opposition movement and gave it a decidedly Islamic coloring. It was customary in Islamic societies for friends and relatives to gather forty days after the death of a loved one to commemorate his or her passing; this custom was used with consummate political skill in the course of the revolution. The leading ayatollahs and other opposition members called on the Iranian people to observe the fortieth day of the deaths at Qum by attending mosque services. In this way, the rhythm of political protest was placed within the framework of Shi'a Islamic rituals, thus granting the religious establishment implicit authority to guide and direct the protest. On February 18, 1978, forty days after the Qum incident, memorial services and peaceful demonstrations took place in all of Iran's major cities. However, the protests turned violent in the city of Tabriz, and the government sent in tanks to quell the disturbances. More than 100 demonstrators died. In commemoration of their martyrdom, another round of memorial services was held forty days later, on March 29, and once again, some of the processions turned violent when the crowds attacked such symbols of the shah's regime as luxury hotels, liquor stores, and movie houses that showed pornographic films. The forces of the regime killed dozens of demonstrators, and the opposition movement again asked the country to honor the dead with another memorial service held on May 10. The cycle of demonstrations, violence, and death was repeated.

At this point, in summer 1978, the shah's government adopted a new economic policy that was both a political and an economic disaster. In order to reduce inflationary pressures, the government decided to slow down the economy. The regime imposed wage freezes, canceled dozens of construction projects, and introduced a general austerity program. These policies quickly created a recession that led to unemployment among urban workers and widespread labor unrest. Many of the urban workers were recent migrants from the countryside living in crowded shantytowns in and around Tehran. Dislocated from their rural existence and not yet fully incorporated into urban life, they were receptive to the calls for protest issued by the spokesmen of Islam.

The recession was a direct result of the regime's policy, and it brought the urban working classes into the streets to join the students and merchants who had been bearing the brunt of the shah's repression. The demonstrators' cries took on a more radical tone as they replaced the calls for the restoration of the constitution with demands for the shah's death and appeals for Khomeini's return. The government responded by declaring martial law and banning street demonstrations. The ban was ignored, and on Friday, September 8, 1978, Tehran exploded in a series of confrontations between protesters from all classes of society and the armed forces of the government. The military deployed all the means at its disposal, from tanks to helicopter gunships, to break up the crowds. Hundreds of unarmed students, workers, and other civilians lost their lives. This episode, known as Black Friday, marked a turning point in the mobilization of public opinion against the shah's regime. In the words of one historian, Black Friday "placed a sea of blood between the shah and the people."⁴ The regime's brutal response drove the masses firmly into Khomeini's camp and forced the Freedom Movement leaders to endorse his call for the overthrow of the shah if they wished to retain any degree of authority in the rapidly escalating confrontation. Black Friday was followed by a wave of strikes in such sensitive industries as the oil refineries and the oil fields. Labor protests reached a peak in October and led to the shutdown of most large industries and to the paralysis of Iran's economy.

The shah behaved indecisively during the latter stages of the revolution. Unable to make up his mind about what course of action to follow and uncertain how much support he had from Washington for a total crackdown on the protesters, he vacillated, alternately offering concessions and ordering the deployment of force. It was later disclosed that he was terminally ill with cancer at the time. Although Muhammad Reza Shah's illness may have affected his judgment, he was not known for decisiveness at times of crisis, and the lack of determination he displayed only fueled the protest's momentum.

The culmination of the revolutionary protest movement occurred in December, during the ten days of Muharram, the customary period of ritual mourning for the death of Imam Husayn. Muharram was the most important ceremony in the Shi'a calendar, and it was used on this occasion to place the antiregime protests firmly within a religious framework. Beginning on December 2, thousands upon thousands of protesters defied the regime's ban on demonstrations and took to the streets of Tehran. Donning white shrouds of martyrdom signifying their willingness to emulate the sacrifices of Ali and Husayn, who had died resisting the tyranny of their era, the marchers waved banners denouncing the shah and his US ally and demanding the return of Khomeini. An estimated 700 protesters were killed during the first three days of Muharram, but still the demonstrations continued, culminating in a huge procession of some 2 million people in Tehran on December 12.

During the Muharram demonstrations, the military foundation on which the shah's regime rested began to crumble. Conscript troops, recoiling at the constant killing of unarmed students, shopkeepers, and workers, deserted their units, joined the demonstrators, and, according to some reports, fired shots at their commanding officers. In these desperate circumstances, Shapour Bakhtiar, a moderate Freedom Movement politician, agreed to become prime minister on the condition that the shah leave the country. But it was too late for the moderation of a figure like Bakhtiar. He was denounced by his colleagues in the Freedom Movement and by Khomeini himself, who issued a proclamation stating that any government appointed by the shah was illegal and that to serve it was to betray Islam.

On January 16, 1979, Muhammad Reza Shah left Iran on what was called an extended vacation. He died a year later, in exile in Egypt. On February 1, Ayatollah Khomeini arrived in triumph, welcomed by a huge crowd. An unarmed popular revolution inspired and guided by an elderly member of the religious establishment had toppled the king of kings and brought an end to the Pahlavi dynasty.

Consolidation of the Revolution and the Establishment of the Islamic Republic

By the time Khomeini returned to Iran, the state, the army, and the internal security forces had disintegrated. The economy had collapsed, and organizations from the political Left to the Far Right had begun contesting for power. It was a truly revolutionary situation—tumultuous, chaotic, and its outcome anything but certain. These circumstances prevailed until 1982, inflamed by the struggle between secular and religious forces, the existence of rival centers of power, and the emergence of autonomous revolutionary organizations. The common thread running through these early, turbulent years was the conflict over the future orientation of Iranian society: Was it to come under the religious establishment's control and become an Islamic theocracy, or was it to emerge as a constitutional regime under moderate reformers of the Bazargan mold? The resolution of this conflict cost thousands of lives and resulted in the total domination of the religious establishment over Iranian life.

The existence of two rival centers of authority made the task of governing more difficult. Khomeini, true to his word that any officials who accepted an appointment from the shah should be regarded as traitors to Islam, refused to recognize Prime Minister Bakhtiar's authority and forced his resignation in early 1979. He then named Mehdi Bazargan, the founder of the Freedom Movement, as prime minister. Bazargan's task was to restore administrative order and economic stability. He and his cabinet of lay moderates sought to rein in the revolutionary organizations and encourage the formation of secular governing institutions. However, the powers invested in the Council of the Islamic Republic, a parallel ruling organization, limited the scope of Bazargan's government. Composed mainly of ulama and subject to Khomeini's guidance, the council was the supreme administrative and legislative body in the country. It issued laws and decrees and had the power to veto policies proposed by Bazargan's government. The overarching authority of the council made it impossible for Bazargan to implement his program, and he resigned in November 1979, frustrated over clerical opposition to his domestic policies and to his attempts to maintain a semblance of cordial relations with the United States.

The emergence of autonomous revolutionary organizations posed a further challenge to the authority of Bazargan's government. As the central state disintegrated in the final weeks of the shah's regime, local committees were formed to carry out basic security and administration tasks. Headed in many instances by Khomeini's supporters among the ulama, these committees expanded the influence of the militant religious establishment throughout the country. In May 1979, Khomeini ordered the formation of the Revolutionary Guards, an armed force distinct from the regular military. Made up largely of impoverished young men from the urban centers, the Revolutionary Guards were deployed against opponents of the revolution and played an important role in the victory of Khomeini's coalition.

Another set of organizations that functioned outside the control of the government were the revolutionary tribunals. Established in February 1979, the tribunals were staffed by religious judges who passed sentences on former officials of the shah's government and others accused of counter-revolutionary activities. The desire for vengeance against officials of the shah's regime ran deep, and by the end of 1979, the revolutionary tribunals had ordered the executions of a former prime minister, several ex-parliamentarians, and hundreds of SAVAK agents and high-ranking military officers.

In order to provide an organizational structure for the ideology of Islamic revolution, a group of ayatollahs close to Khomeini formed the Islamic Republic Party (IRP) in mid-1979. The IRP sought to mobilize popular support for the Islamic Republic and to discredit secular moderates. With its close connections to the national network of ulama, who in turn had regular and direct access to the population through the mosques, the IRP rapidly became the major political force within Iran. The IRP's powers of persuasion were increased by its ability to call upon the Revolutionary Guards to break up opposition rallies and to secure the arrest and detention of opposition figures.

Although the collapse of the shah's regime gave rise to an array of competing political groups that covered the full political spectrum, from Marxists to militant clerics, the main contenders for power were the IRP and various strands of the Freedom Movement. The IRP had the support of the majority of the ulama and the urban and rural masses, who had much to gain from a radical transformation of the political and social structure of Iran and who could identify with Khomeini's calls for the implementation of a program of Islamic social justice. The Freedom Movement politicians appealed to the middle-class technocrats and professionals, to some members of the bazaar, to segments within the Westernized universities, and to all who opposed the prospect of ulama dominance of government. Their constituency's link to the Western-oriented elements of society contributed to their defeat.

The steps that led to the establishment of a new Islamic order in Iran began with a national referendum in March 1979 that approved the replacement of the monarchy with an Islamic Republic. The results of this referendum inaugurated a struggle to define the constitutional meaning of the term Islamic Republic. In June 1979, Bazargan's government drafted a constitution that endorsed the principle of an Islamic state but did not grant any special administrative or judicial powers to the religious establishment. The government's draft was then submitted for debate to a popularly elected Assembly of Experts, the majority of whom were ulama. Khomeini personally addressed the first gathering of the assembly and informed the delegates that the constitution should be based "one hundred per cent on Islam."⁵ In the course of its deliberations, the Assembly of Experts completely restructured the government's original draft, producing a constitution that required all of Iran's laws and regulations to be based on Islamic rules and standards. This condition made it possible for the ulama to become the dominant governing authorities within the state. The outcome of the constitutional debate launched Iran on the path of full political, legal, and social Islamization and may be considered every bit as revolutionary a development as the overthrow of the shah.

In terms of governing authority, the constitution set up competing centers of power that led to administrative paralysis and popular discontent once the dominating figure of Khomeini had passed from the scene in 1989. On the one hand, the constitution gave the Iranian people the opportunity to directly elect the president, the members of the single-chamber national assembly, or Majlis, and the municipal councils. But on the other hand, the constitution placed ultimate authority in the hands of nonelected officials, almost all of whom were ulama. These officials made up the Council of Guardians, whose twelve appointed members held far-reaching powers of legislative review. All laws and regulations approved by the Majlis had to be submitted to the council, which had the power to approve or reject them on the basis of their conformity to Islamic standards.

The constitution also adopted the principle known as vilayat-i faqih, the governance of the Islamic jurist on behalf of the Hidden Imam. Khomeini himself was entrusted with the responsibility of serving as the supreme Islamic jurist. It was the most powerful position in the governmental structure, and, as with the Council of Guardians, the supreme jurist was selected by appointment, not by popular elections. The position was to be held by “an honest, virtuous, well-informed, courageous, efficient administrator and religious jurist” who would serve as the leader of the people in the absence of the Hidden Twelfth Imam. Among the wide-ranging constitutional powers granted to the Islamic jurist was the right to appoint half the members of the Council of Guardians and to appoint and dismiss the commander in chief of the armed forces and the Revolutionary Guards as well as the commanders of the army, navy, and air force. In addition, the Islamic jurist was empowered to rule on the qualifications of candidates for president and to confirm the president’s election. The creation of the position of supreme Islamic jurist was a triumph for Khomeini’s long-standing belief that a truly Islamic state could be ensured only by the governance of the religious establishment. If, as the 1979 constitution stated, the Islamic Republic of Iran was a system based on the fundamental role of divine inspiration in the interpretation of laws, then only those who had mastered Islamic jurisprudence were qualified to administer the laws. The Iranian revolution elevated the men of religion from their previous status as interpreters of the divine will for secular monarchs to the status of rulers themselves.

The revised constitution was approved in a national referendum held in late 1979, and the first president of the Islamic Republic, Abol Hasan Bani-Sadr, was elected in 1980. Bani-Sadr (b. 1933) became a devotee of Khomeini while studying in Paris and served as his contact with the Western press during the ayatollah's stay in the French capital. Although Bani-Sadr was committed to preserving Iran's Islamic cultural identity, he nevertheless favored secular government and opposed the growing dominance of the religious establishment. His resounding election victory was the result of his close personal association with Khomeini, not his political ideas. His short and chaotic presidency was devoted to attempts at stopping the ulama takeover of Iranian government, curbing the excesses of the Revolutionary Guards, and bringing local committees and revolutionary tribunals under the central government's authority.

Bani-Sadr not only faced an imposing array of domestic issues; he also had to deal with two difficult foreign matters. In November 1979, youthful supporters of Khomeini occupied the US embassy in Tehran and took 57 US foreign service personnel hostage, holding them for 444 days. The drawn-out hostage issue embroiled Iran in a bitter dispute with the United States that poisoned relations between the two countries and contributed to the US public's growing animosity toward Khomeini's regime. An ill-conceived and poorly executed attempt by the US armed forces to rescue the hostages further inflamed Iranian opinion against the United States, destroyed President Jimmy Carter's reelection hopes, and undermined President Bani-Sadr's attempts to achieve a negotiated settlement to the crisis. To compound the president's difficulties, Iraq invaded Iran in late 1980, forcing Iran to wage a war for its survival at the same time that the revolutionary tribunals were purging the armed forces.

Although segments of the professional middle class supported Bani-Sadr, Khomeini and the Islamic Republican Party could call upon more widespread and more ruthless support within Iranian society. The secular middle-class reformers, who had once expected to dominate the post-shah era, were frightened into flight or silence. Bani-Sadr thus became politically isolated, and Khomeini finally abandoned him by allowing him to be impeached in 1981. Within two years, the revolution had devoured its first prime minister and its first president, both of whom advocated some form of restrictions on the ulama's control over the machinery of government.

But no sooner had the Islamic Republic defeated its moderate secular challengers than it faced a new wave of opposition from the militant Islamic Left. During the second half of 1981, a wave of terrorist bombings carried out by the Mujahedin-i Khalq killed dozens of religious and political leaders and threatened to destabilize the regime. The government responded to the Mujahedin attacks with mass arrests and executions of such intensity that they constituted a reign of terror. According to one historian, the leftist threat led the government to intensify its efforts to impose ideological conformity over society as a whole.⁶ The regime instituted a series of loyalty tests for civil servants, teachers, and other state employees. All of Iran's universities and colleges had been shut down in 1980 in order to undergo Islamization. During the closure, faculty were purged, curricula were redesigned to emphasize Islamic values, and textbooks were modified. When the universities started to reopen in 1982, the government made sure that only students with solid Islamic credentials and no records of leftist political activity were admitted. This policy resulted in a substantial drop in overall enrollments and a dramatic reduction in the number of female students: Tehran University declined from 17,000 students before the revolution to around 4,500 in 1983, and the proportion of women enrolled dropped from 40 percent of the total in the late 1970s to 10 percent.

By 1982, the Islamic Republic had turned back the challenges from both the Center and the Left and had secured its control over Iranian political life. The regime then turned its attention to economic recovery, restoring administrative efficiency, and the war with Iraq. Iraq's invasion in 1980 served to rally support for Khomeini and the Islamic Republic. Sentiments of Iranian patriotism and pride in defending the cause of Islam against Saddam Husayn's regime generated widespread feelings of loyalty to the new republic and the Islamic principles for which it stood. The war also enabled the government to expand its authority by recruiting thousands of young men for service in the Revolutionary Guards and the regular armed services. If the conflict enabled Khomeini and his supporters to consolidate the Islamic revolution, their political triumph was achieved at a very high price. Over 260,000 Iranians were killed during the war, and another 1.6 million were made homeless; the cities along the Iraqi border were reduced to rubble, and port installations, oil refineries, irrigation networks, roads, and bridges were destroyed. Iran faced a reconstruction challenge of immense proportions. Unlike Iraq, Iran's government financed the war out of its current reserves rather than borrowing huge sums abroad. Although this policy created severe economic hardships for the population, Iran emerged from the war without the crippling indebtedness of Iraq and with a newfound sense of self-reliance born out of self-sacrifice. But the people expected rewards for their self-sacrifice. If the regime was to survive, it had to provide Iranians with social and economic benefits. For this to occur, the leadership would have to overcome the disagreements on economic policy that so divided its members.

The Islamization of Iranian Society

Because of the demands of the war, the government postponed decisions on how Islamic laws and standards were to be introduced and applied. From the first days of Khomeini's rule, though, certain objectives were established. Primary among them was the achievement of the Islamic principles of social justice and the equitable distribution of wealth. In the economic sphere, the attempt to achieve these goals resulted in an expansion of the role of the state at the expense of private enterprise. The government nationalized banks and insurance companies as well as large industrial complexes. But there were sharp disagreements between supporters of capitalism and advocates of state control of the economy. As a result of these divergent views, the regime had not formulated a coherent economic policy by the time of Khomeini's death in 1989.

In the countryside, the early months of revolutionary turmoil witnessed the spontaneous seizure of land by the peasants and the confiscation of large landholdings by local revolutionary courts. The government endeavored to gain control of the situation by proclaiming a sweeping land reform law that provided for the confiscation of middle and large holdings and their distribution to landless peasants. The response to this law revealed the intricacies of Islamic jurisprudence and the difficulties that would be faced in attempting to implement it. Although the intent of the land reform law was to further social justice, certain members of the religious establishment—some ulama were large landowners—spoke out against it on the grounds that Islamic jurisprudence also defended the right of private property. The Council of Guardians vetoed the legislation, and the Iranian countryside remained chaotic for most of the 1980s. Rulings that protected the vested interests of the ulama and evidence of a marked improvement in the well-being of some mujtahids and ayatollahs aroused public suspicions that representatives of the religious establishment were gaining undue benefits from their exercise of political power. These suspicions were encapsulated in a popular song that has a low-ranking member of the ulama saying, “My poor old mule died last week; so to replace him I bought a Mercedes Benz.”⁷

In other spheres of governmental responsibility, the process of Islamization took place more rapidly. There was, for example, a dramatic reorientation of the qualifications for the judiciary. In a reversal of legislation passed under Reza Shah in the 1930s that stipulated that only judges who had Western law degrees would be allowed to hear cases, the Islamic Republic of the 1980s decreed that judgeships would be awarded only to individuals with competence in Islamic law. Secular judges who lacked such competence were to be transferred, retired, or dismissed. In 1982, Khomeini insisted that Iran’s courts discard all secular legal codes and base their decisions solely on Islamic regulations. This ruling necessitated an extensive review and augmentation of Islamic law, which was not specific in all areas of legal transactions and processes.

Additional Islamization occurred in the realm of gender relations. In effect, the new regime dismantled many of the rights women had acquired under the two Pahlavi shahs. A dress code requiring all women, including female civil servants, to wear the loose-fitting garments and head scarf known as hijab was introduced in 1980. The university women who donned hijab clothing during the revolutionary days of 1978 as an assertion of cultural identity and revolutionary solidarity surely did not anticipate that they would later be subject to laws that required them to wear those same garments or face arrest and a year in jail.

By 1981, the family protection laws promulgated by Muhammad Reza Shah were altered, and women lost the right to initiate divorce, to retain child custody, to attend school if they were married, and to study such subjects as law, medicine, and engineering. Khomeini and his supporters opposed female emancipation on the grounds that it would disrupt family life. In this view, women could not fulfill their primary roles as mothers and wives if they participated in public affairs. The notable exception to this series of restrictions was enfranchisement—women retained the right to vote and used it with increasing effect in the years to come. The regime further sought to purify society by implementing measures that ranged from banning music and dancing in public places to cracking down on drug dealers to razing Tehran’s red-light district.

In its foreign relations, Iran was isolated in the Middle East and the international community throughout the 1980s. Statements by Khomeini and other high-ranking religious leaders claiming that the goal of the Iranian revolution was to establish a universal Islamic order alarmed the leaders of the Arab states, who feared for the security of their own regimes. Iran’s support of radical Shi‘a groups in Lebanon who seized US and European hostages illustrated its intent to export its revolution. Thus, with the exception of Syria and Libya, the Arab states sided with Iraq in the Iran-Iraq conflict.

One of the goals of the revolution was to end Iran’s dependence on the United States and to assert an independent foreign policy that was, in Khomeini’s words, “neither East nor West.” The Iranian leadership was also distrustful of Soviet motives in the Middle East and had no intention of substituting Moscow’s embrace for that of Washington. For its part, the United States was at a loss over how to deal with revolutionary Iran. The Reagan administration of the 1980s sought to contain the spread of Islamic fervor and anti-US sentiment associated with the Khomeini regime. But the administration also recognized the economic and geopolitical significance of Iran and searched for avenues through which normal relations could be established with Tehran. This search led to the bizarre and inept episode subsequently known as Irangate or Contragate.

During 1985 and 1986, the United States, which was leading the campaign to impose an international arms embargo on Iran, secretly sold thousands of antitank missiles and tons of military spare parts to Tehran, mainly by using Israel as an intermediary. The purpose of the operation was to improve relations with Iran and to persuade the Khomeini regime to pressure pro-Iranian groups to release the US hostages they held in Lebanon. The operation failed miserably; three hostages were released but additional ones were taken, and Iran received a windfall of weaponry and spare parts. Moreover, the revelation that a small group of officials in the White House and the National Security Agency had arranged the secret arms sales without the knowledge or approval of the State Department caused a domestic scandal in the United States that tarnished the Reagan presidency. And finally, Washington's willingness to deal secretly with the Khomeini regime while publicly denouncing that same regime prompted the United States' Arab allies in the Gulf to question the sincerity of US diplomacy. The Irangate affair represented another example of the difficulty the US government had in coping with the complexities of change created by the Iranian revolution.

With the end of the war with Iraq in 1988, the regime was forced to consider whether foreign firms should be allowed to participate in rebuilding the country or whether to continue on the path of total self-reliance. Although relations with the United States remained strained, Tehran did restore diplomatic relations with the major states of Western Europe and toned down its calls for the establishment of an Islamic order in the Middle East.

The revolutionary impulse within Iran had moderated by the late 1980s, and a certain accommodation was achieved between the requirements of piety in the workplace and the need for managerial competence. Iranian politics developed a pattern of “authoritarian populism” centered on Khomeini’s personal charisma and his constitutional powers as supreme Islamic jurist.⁸ Khomeini commanded a large base of mass support by addressing Iran’s political, social, and economic issues in terms of Islamic ideology, an ideology the population understood and endorsed. But the use of Islamic doctrine did not imply the desire for a simple return to the past. To portray the revolution, as many US commentators did, as backward looking and disembodied from the realities of everyday Iranian life is to miss its significance. The goals of the leaders—and certainly of the masses who supported them—were to improve the quality of life in the present. Social justice and cultural integrity went hand in hand. Hopes for a better economic future motivated the mass revolutionary uprising against the shah's oppressive government and the privileged elite who benefited from it. Khomeini did not use his enormous constitutional powers as supreme Islamic jurist to establish a direct personal dictatorship; rather, he acted as a guide, offering decisions on major questions and avoiding involvement in routine administrative matters. He ruled by balancing various government factions against one another, making sure no single group gained dominance. This may have been one reason the Islamic Republic Party was abruptly dissolved in 1987; it had served its purpose of establishing clerical authority and was abolished before it became a rival center of power. At times, Khomeini refused to make decisions on vital issues, a practice that kept his lieutenants guessing as to his wishes and paralyzed the operations of the government.

Although political life in the Islamic Republic was markedly different from what it had been under the shah, freedom of expression and choice were nonetheless constrained. The requirement that the Council of Guardians had to approve candidates for the Majlis ensured that no opponents of the regime would be elected to the national assembly. Nevertheless, the candidates did offer voters a choice, and debate within the Majlis was spirited even though the discussion of certain topics was prohibited. In addition, the very existence of relatively free elections represented a marked change from the shah's regime. The Islamic revolution ushered in a period of mass politics in which popular opinion, expressed at the polls, played a role it had previously been denied.

During its first decade, the Islamic Republic did not employ a centralized security agency. However, correct political and social behavior was enforced by the Revolutionary Guards and bands of young men who roughed up, arrested, and occasionally executed individuals who were suspected of opposing the regime or were identified as engaging in practices contrary to Islamic norms. The menacing shadow of SAVAK had been removed, but it was replaced with the equally menacing possibility of arbitrary punishment meted out by organizations operating outside the authority of the state but with the state's tacit approval.

In June 1989, Khomeini's death triggered great outpourings of popular grief. The question of succession had been settled in advance, and there was a smooth transition of power to Ayatollah Ali Khamenei as ruling Islamic jurist. By this time, members of the religious establishment held all of the leading positions in government; Khomeini's goal of consolidating the political authority of the ulama had been achieved. A deep divide still separated the proponents of religious and secular institutions, but the regime of the ayatollahs was widely accepted, if not always well liked. It remained to be seen how effectively that regime would function in the absence of the charismatic individual who had been responsible for its creation.

THE REVIVAL OF ISLAM

An Overview

Although the Islamic revolution in Iran was by no means the first manifestation of Islamic-oriented political activity in the 1970s, the impact it made called attention to the existence of Islamic movements in other countries. There can be no precise date for the emergence of a phenomenon such as the Islamic resurgence, but most observers have identified the resounding Arab defeat in the June War with Israel as the point at which disillusionment with borrowed ideologies and cultures became pronounced. During the 1970s and 1980s, the Islamic states of the Middle East—and beyond—experienced an outgrowth of popular demands to restore Islam to a central role in political and social life. Although the resurgence of Islam occurred in virtually every Islamic country, the forces that gave rise to it were specific to individual states. The movement should therefore be seen as a phenomenon that had its origins in the context of local conditions even though it acquired certain transnational features.

The first challenge facing the historian of this subject is deciding what to call it. Some Western scholars and journalists use the term fundamentalism—often, though not always, in a pejorative manner. But in the strictest historical sense, fundamentalism refers to a specific movement of American evangelical Protestantism in the early 1920s and is unsuitable as a defining label for Islamic groups. This book will employ the terms Islamism, political Islam, and Islamists to describe the contemporary current of Islamic activism and those who participated in it.

Some Western writers have characterized Islamists as fanatics or backward-looking reactionaries. That is an inaccurate portrayal of the movement and of the majority of the people who are sympathetic to it. The driving force behind the Islamic resurgence was not a rejection of change; rather, it was a rejection of the Middle East's dependence on Western and other alien models of development. The Islamic resurgence was also motivated by a rejection of the assumptions on which Western development theories were based. These theories equated modernization with secularization and suggested that societies would become modern only as they freed themselves from their traditional religious faiths. The Western experience in which church and state became separated and society became generally secular was posited as the only viable path to true modernity. But to many Muslims who reflected on the course of their modern history, this path had not only been forced on them; it had failed them.

As we have seen in earlier chapters, a dominant theme of nineteenth- and twentieth-century Middle Eastern history was the attempt by certain rulers to adopt Western technology, ideology, culture, and institutions. From the military uniforms of Sultan Selim III's new army to the weapons of Muhammad Ali's Egyptian forces, from Isma'il's opera house and school system to the Ottoman constitution, and from Atatürk's relentless secularization policies to Muhammad Reza Shah's program of economic development, the inspiration was Western, not Islamic. These and other rulers' objective was to imitate the West because Western products, techniques, or political institutions appeared to be superior.

Yet the end result of the nineteenth-century reforms was the defeat of the Ottoman Empire and the occupation of Arab-Islamic lands by Britain and France. The two European powers sought to generate a European model of political development by imposing Western-style parliamentary systems on Egypt and the Arab mandates. The systems failed, largely because they had not evolved out of the social and political fabric of the states on which they were imposed and because of their cynical manipulation by the imperial powers, and they were swept aside following World War II. In the 1950s and 1960s, Nasser and his imitators throughout the Arab world endeavored to create social equality and economic development through the adoption of socialist doctrines; Nasser was careful to label them Arab socialism in an attempt to disguise their foreign origins. He and his admirers also emphasized Pan-Arab nationalism as the ideology that would lead the Arabs to unity, dignity, and victory over Israel. But Arab unity was never realized, and Arab socialism tended to produce bloated bureaucracies and inefficient economies. The Nasser-era ideologies were already losing their power when they were dealt a devastating blow by the humiliating defeat of Egypt, Syria, and Jordan in the June War of 1967. Many Muslim Arabs regarded the defeat as more than a military disaster; they saw it as God's punishment of Muslims for straying from the divine path set forth in the Quran and the shari'ah.

In addition to adopting foreign institutions, the Muslim states of the Middle East were inundated with foreign products, and their inhabitants were urged to practice Western patterns of consumption that often seemed to contradict Islamic mores, to say nothing about common sense. The duty-free shops in the airports of even the most conservative Gulf states did a thriving business in packaged alcoholic beverages, and the presence of a bottle of Johnnie Walker Black Label scotch in the sitting room became, for some, a symbol of middle-class success. A sociologist's portrait of an Egyptian peasant relaxing with his family after a grueling day's work in the fields shows the jarring intrusion of foreign values into the Middle East during the 1970s: The peasant is watching Egyptian television on the set his son has purchased with money earned by working abroad. The program on the screen is Dallas. During commercial breaks, he "is told in English that he should be drinking Schweppes or in dubbed Arabic that he should use deodorant, and that all his problems are caused by having too many children —a total package of imported ideas."⁹ This sort of situation caused some Muslims to reflect on the dangers—and the folly—of relying on external cultural values.

As a result of the failure of imported, secular models to bring economic progress, political freedoms, or social justice, many Middle Eastern Muslims began to question their leaders' reliance on foreign practices and to reexamine their own personal values. By departing from an integral Islamic order, an order in which political, social, and economic activities were conducted according to the shari'ah, their leaders had, many Muslims believed, contributed to the weakness of Islamic society as a whole. Muslims who held this view asserted that Islam contained the necessary ingredients for modern development. To be healthy, political and economic life should be derived from the moral values rooted in Islam, not from Western consumerism and materialism. Muslims undertook a renewed effort to find Islamic solutions to the problems that confronted them in their daily lives and troubled their societies as a whole.

However, it should be pointed out that for the vast majority of Muslims, the rural peasantry and the urban poor, Islam had remained a constant feature of their existence. They had not participated in the debates over socialism and capitalism, nationalism and Ba'thism. As illiterate or semiliterate members of society, the Muslim masses had little reason to question the role of Islam in their lives. They continued to be strongly influenced by the rudiments of Islamic instruction they received in childhood, by the oral transmission of stories and legends about the heroic age of Islam, and by the general Islamic value system that shaped their outlook.

What was new about the Islamic resurgence of the 1970s and 1980s was the participation of members of literate urban society in a general movement to assert Islamic cultural authenticity. Among ordinary men and women, the Islamic resurgence was manifested by increased attendance at mosque services and by the adoption of Islamic dress codes, including the growing of beards by men and the wearing of hijab clothing by women. One educated Egyptian woman explained to a foreign visitor that wearing proper Islamic dress helped her overcome the frustrations of daily living: “We have problems with housing, with budgets, with the schools, with transportation, with electricity, butagas and water, and the telephone doesn’t work. When we put on ziyy shari [lawful dress], we feel that at least here is one problem we can solve for our families and society for ourselves. At least we’ve done something.”¹⁰ Other examples of the Islamic resurgence included an enormous increase in the publication of religious materials, a growth in the popularity of televised sermons, and a willingness to deposit funds in so-called Islamic banks that did not pay interest.

A significant component of the Islamic resurgence was a demand for the return of the shari‘ah. The Western legal codes that had been adopted piecemeal by the Ottoman Empire and Egypt during the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries drastically reduced the scope of shari‘ah jurisdiction in civil law. In 1949, an Egyptian jurist, Abd al-Raziq al-Sanhuri, framed a new Egyptian civil code drawing on examples from existing Egyptian legislation, from other contemporary codes, and from the shari‘ah. Although al-Sanhuri attempted to select rules of foreign origin on the basis of their conformity to the shari‘ah, the completed code was more French than Islamic. Al-Sanhuri also drew up civil codes for Iraq and Kuwait. The legal reforms of the post–World War II era made inroads into the last vestiges of shari‘ah.

Family law, or the law of personal status, was an even more sensitive issue because it touched the population directly and was regarded as the very heart of the shari‘ah. Yet even in this sphere of activity, rulers in Turkey, Iran, Iraq, Syria, and Egypt introduced legislation that altered the shari‘ah provisions dealing with the status of women. Such legislation contributed to the popular opinion that leaders who chose to ignore the shari‘ah and to impose statutes of Western origin were undermining the proper order of state and society. Thus, the very essence of Islamic society, rule by divine law, was eliminated. During the period of malaise that set in after 1967, militants and ordinary citizens alike expressed a desire for the reestablishment of the shari‘ah.

In the 1970s, Islam was increasingly used as a political tool. As the populations of Islamic states came to demand greater adherence to shari‘ah-inspired policies on the part of their rulers, political leaders sought to rally mass support through the manipulation of Islamic symbols. Ayatollah Khomeini, for example, was able to rally the Iranian people against the shah by using Islamic symbols and slogans. In the Iranian protest movement, as in others, the instruments of modern communications assisted the spread of a religiously based message; the cassette recordings of the speeches of Khomeini and Shari‘ati played an important role in expanding the audience of the two men. Rulers also used Islamic symbols to bolster their legitimacy. With the exception of Atatürk, no modern Muslim ruler has openly disavowed Islam. On the contrary, political leaders have sought to associate themselves with Islamic activities and have been quick to portray their domestic opponents as imperfect Muslims. The late shah of Iran tried to calm the growing opposition to his rule by proclaiming his attachment to Islam and his closeness to God. As the war clouds gathered over the Persian Gulf in early 1991, Saddam Husayn of Iraq attempted to rally international Islamic opinion to his side by presenting the US-led UN coalition as an anti-Islamic campaign and calling on Muslims to wage a jihad throughout the world. Thus, Islamic symbols could become powerful mobilizing agents for opposition movements and incumbent regimes alike.

CONCLUSION

The revolution that swept aside the regime of Muhammad Reza Shah in the final months of 1978 has been described as “one of the greatest populist explosions in human history.”¹¹ During the Muharram demonstrations of December, millions of Iranians joined in protest marches against the shah.

Denouncing the secular, authoritarian, and corrupt monarchy of the Pahlavis and its US sponsors, the demonstrators demanded the return of Ayatollah Khomeini and the creation of an Islamic government, a combination they believed would bring about social justice, economic equality, political freedom, and sovereign independence. The Shi'a religious network, though battered by five decades of Pahlavi secularism and oppression, had remained intact and was available to direct the popular protest and to ensure it was expressed through an Islamic idiom. Two intertwining sentiments were at work in the revolution: a desire for social, political, and economic change, and a belief that only the renewal of an Islamic order could effect such change.

The desire for the reconstitution of Islamic cultural traditions cut across classes and generations, yet there was a decided difference of opinion on the degree to which historical Islamic institutions should be implemented. Moderate liberal reformers favored the restoration of Islamic cultural values in combination with secular governing institutions, but the religious establishment and the popular support the ulama obtained for revolutionary change overwhelmed them.

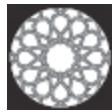

Although Iran provides a unique example of a Muslim religious establishment's use of Islam to bring about revolutionary political and social transformation, it was not the only case of Islamic protest against existing regimes. In all Islamic states, from Indonesia to Morocco, the 1970s and 1980s witnessed popular demands for the restoration of the shari'ah and the renewal of the Islamic heritage. The failure of the independent regimes of the post-World War II era to solve pressing social and economic problems through the imitation of foreign models of development created a growing sense of popular disillusionment with external ideologies. The general public, through such gestures as wearing Islamic dress, expressed their desire for the restoration of an Islamic social order, an order in which religion governed human relations and rulers were expected to govern in accordance with the principles of divine law. The belief in the need to restore an Islamic social order went beyond a popular desire to assert the authenticity of Islamic cultural traditions; it was also a belief that the essence of Islam was a divinely ordained system. In copying Western institutions, Muslims had abandoned the pattern of existence that God had commanded them to follow. Only by restoring, in a modern context, the divinely ordained social order would Muslim states experience prosperity and harmony.

These sentiments, or variations of them, continued to have popular appeal in the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries.

CHAPTER 19

CHANGING PATTERNS OF WAR AND PEACE

Egypt and Lebanon in the 1970s and 1980s

Rather than continuities, it was the discontinuities of the years from the early 1970s onward that were most strikingly evident in Egypt and Lebanon. Nasser's successor, Anwar Sadat, endeavored to break the diplomatic stalemate with Israel and to chart a new direction for the Egyptian economy. In the process of pursuing these objectives, Sadat waged war, negotiated for peace, formed an alliance with the United States, and reintroduced capitalist incentives into Egypt. Sadat's partial reordering of Egypt's economic policies represented a departure from the Nasserist model, and his foreign policy marked a sharp and dramatic break from the goals Nasser had pursued. The failure of these new policies to solve Egypt's problems created the environment in which Islamist opposition movements gained traction. Nasser's socialism had not prevented the humiliation of 1967, and Sadat's encouragement of capitalism and his reliance on the West did not generate noticeable improvements. Egypt was gripped by a social malaise and a yearning for guidance and hope. In this atmosphere, the Islamic values that in the past had provided the foundations for social harmony received new attention in the political arena. Although the Islamic movement in Egypt during the 1970s and 1980s was grounded in the distinctive circumstances of Egyptian history, it exhibited many of the features that characterized the Islamic resurgence as a whole.

The history of Lebanon in the twenty-year period covered by this chapter is one of internal breakdown closely interwoven with the impact of external forces. The sectarian cooperation that had characterized Lebanon since independence collapsed in a wave of communal violence, and the state that had been the Arab world's symbol of tolerance and compromise was plunged into a bloody civil war that lasted fifteen years. Although the causes of Lebanon's civil war were primarily internal, regional influences also played a role. Lebanese society was divided over the presence of the armed Palestinian resistance movement in the country, and the civil war was fought, in part, to determine the PLO's status within Lebanon's borders. Syria and Israel both attempted to shape the outcome of the civil war to their advantage through armed intervention that prolonged the conflict and increased the suffering.

EGYPT UNDER SADAT: DOMESTIC AND DIPLOMATIC REALIGNMENTS

Anwar Sadat (1918–1981) was not the expected choice to fill the considerable void left by Nasser's death in 1970. Although he had been one of the original Free Officers, Sadat did not command the respect of his peers or the Egyptian public. Known in some quarters as "Nasser's poodle," he was viewed as a weak and pliable yes-man who would soon be replaced by a stronger figure. But Sadat showed that he was not to be taken lightly. Although his policies were highly controversial, even his detractors acknowledge that he reoriented Egyptian domestic and foreign policy in ways that were every bit as profound as Nasser's.

Sadat's first task was to secure his domestic political base, which he did in May 1971 by purging the government and the Arab Socialist Union (ASU) of his rivals. He then proclaimed political and economic liberalization wrapped up in the slogan of "the revolution of rectification." Sadat had gained control of the levers of power, but what was he to do with them? Indeed, what power did Egypt still have in 1971? Sadat had inherited from Nasser a thorny set of interrelated economic and diplomatic problems. The "no war, no peace" confrontation with Israel required military expenditures that were draining the Egyptian economy of several hundred million dollars per year. As long as Egypt remained in a state of active hostility with Israel, such potential sources of revenue as tourism, Suez Canal tolls, and foreign investment would not materialize. Egypt desperately needed peace to rebuild its economy, but the diplomatic circumstances were not conducive to a lessening of tensions. Israel, made confident by its resounding military triumph in 1967 and kept solvent by generous US assistance, saw no reason to make concessions from its position of strength. Egypt, defeated, indebted, and occupied by Israeli forces from Suez to Gaza, had no leverage with which to change Israel's attitude.

Assuming that only the United States had the power to alter Israel's negotiating position, Sadat attempted to persuade them into breaking the diplomatic stalemate. In July 1972, Sadat abruptly expelled most of the 20,000 members of the Soviet military mission to Egypt. This by no means terminated the Soviet-Egyptian relationship, but it was the first step toward a major realignment of Egypt's relations with the superpowers. The dismissal of the Soviet advisers weakened Egypt's military capabilities, a risk Sadat was prepared to take in order to demonstrate to the United States his independence from the Soviet Union and his willingness to entertain the notion of US diplomatic involvement in Egypt's conflict with Israel. As it turned out, Sadat's timing was unfortunate: The Soviets' expulsion occurred just a few weeks before the Palestinian terrorist operation against the Israeli Olympic team in Munich. The Egyptian president's gesture was wasted on a US public that had no sympathy for Arab causes.

The October 1973 War

After two years, Sadat had achieved little. The measure of despair that affected Egypt generally was reflected in 1972 and early 1973 in student demonstrations that criticized the government's apparent lack of resolve. Sadat renewed his efforts to break the diplomatic stalemate. If Egypt could show that Israeli military might was not as all-powerful as assumed, then perhaps the United States could be persuaded to enter the negotiating process and work to soften Israel's hardline position. In pursuit of this aim, Sadat, with Syria as an ally, undertook war as an instrument of diplomacy.

In the early afternoon of October 6, 1973, Egyptian forces launched an attack across the Suez Canal in coordination with a Syrian offensive against Israeli positions on the Golan Heights. The Egyptians achieved stunning success as they breached the Bar Lev line on the east bank of the canal and overwhelmed the Israeli positions. It was a considerable achievement for Egyptian arms. Soviet advisers had earlier told Sadat that although the operation was possible, it would take four days and result in a 50 percent casualty rate. But in the first twenty-four hours of the offensive, Egypt put 80,000 men across the canal and lost just 200. This episode in the October War became enshrined in Egyptian consciousness as “the crossing” and stood as a symbol of military triumph after a quarter century of unrelenting defeats at the hands of the Israelis.

Although Egyptian forces continued to perform well, they did not again go on the offensive after the crossing; instead, they stopped their advance and consolidated their positions in a front eight miles (thirteen kilometers) deep east of the canal. There was no reason to push further: Sadat’s limited objectives had already been achieved. He had restored Egypt’s credibility as a military power, retaken a certain amount of occupied Egyptian territory, and demonstrated to the superpowers that Israeli superiority could not be taken for granted. Thus, Egyptian forces dug in and waited for international diplomacy to take its course. But by failing to press their advantage, the Egyptians gave the Israelis time to stabilize the Syrian front and to mount a counterattack against Egyptian positions.

On October 16, Israeli forces under General Ariel Sharon pierced Egyptian defenses and crossed to the west bank of the Suez Canal. This maneuver entrapped the Egyptian Third Army and brought Sharon’s tanks within striking distance of Cairo. The outlook of the conflict had suddenly been altered. Not wanting to lose the advantages the crossing had provided, Sadat and his Soviet ally were ready to accept a cease-fire. On October 22, US Secretary of State Henry Kissinger and the Soviet Union’s foreign minister Andrei Gromyko presented a cease-fire agreement that Egypt, Israel, and, later, Syria accepted.

That US and Soviet officials had arranged the cease-fire demonstrated that Sadat had achieved his purpose of involving the superpowers in the Middle East conflict; indeed, the October War was to some extent a proxy fight. From October 14 to November 15, the United States airlifted 22,000 tons of military supplies to Israel; the scale of the Soviet resupply to Egypt and Syria was also enormous. There was something grotesque in the superpowers' willingness to replenish their clients' equipment in order to enable them to continue a war that might otherwise have ended sooner. The essence of the situation was captured in a political cartoon of the time that portrayed Egypt and Israel as two deflating balloons being pumped up by the Soviet Union and the United States, respectively.

Given the scale of the fighting and the eagerness of the superpowers to resupply the combatants, it is not surprising that the costs of the war were staggering. Israel suffered over 2,500 dead, Egypt lost 7,700 men, and Syria 3,500. Egypt and Syria together lost over 2,000 tanks and 450 aircraft, as compared to Israeli losses of 800 tanks and over 100 aircraft. As sobering as these statistics were, the war raised the even more chilling prospect of direct superpower engagement in the Middle East. If the Egyptian position had deteriorated further, would the Soviet Union have been compelled to intervene to rescue its client? And if that had occurred, would the United States have been forced to protect Israel? The October War demonstrated that as long as the Arab-Israeli conflict persisted in the form it had then, the potential for superpower conflict was present. This was one reason for the new level of US involvement in Middle East peacemaking after October 1973.

Another reason was oil. The October War completely changed the face of the petroleum industry and provided the oil-producing nations with a level of power that was previously thought impossible for them to achieve. On October 17, in a gesture of sympathy with Syria and Egypt, the Arab member states of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC) announced that they would reduce their oil production by 5 percent a month until Israel withdrew from the occupied Arab territories. Two days later, Saudi Arabia suspended indefinitely all oil shipments to the United States. The reduction in the international supply of oil sent prices soaring and caused the world community to reassess its previously held assumptions about petroleum production (see Chapter 20). Within the context of the diplomacy of the Arab-Israeli conflict, the use of oil as a weapon prompted the governments of Western Europe and Japan to look more favorably on the Arab cause and forced US policymakers to face up to the growing US dependency on imported oil. The oil factor was a major incentive for Washington's intensive efforts to seek a peaceful settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

These efforts were represented by Secretary of State Kissinger's so-called shuttle diplomacy. In January 1974, Kissinger negotiated a disengagement agreement between Egypt and Israel, and in September 1975, he persuaded the two parties to sign a document known as Sinai II, which provided for the withdrawal of Israeli forces from western Sinai. US peacemaking was smoothed by economic assistance. The special relationship between the United States and Israel was reconfirmed during the negotiating sessions and was reflected by an increase in US military aid from an average annual sum of $400 million in the period 1971–1973 to an average of $1.5 billion during 1974–1975. This amounted to 42 percent of Israel's annual defense spending. Egypt also reaped rewards for its willingness to follow Kissinger's lead. The United States contributed to the reconstruction of the Suez Canal, which reopened in 1975, and raised its economic assistance package to Cairo from $8.5 million in 1974 to $750 million by 1976.

From the Crossing to the Infitah

Despite the precarious military situation that prevailed at the time of the cease-fire, the October War was a political triumph for President Sadat. Styling himself the hero of the crossing, he basked in the popularity the Egyptian people accorded him. He promised them that the spirit of the crossing would be transferred to the task of restructuring the economy and would bring substantial benefits to the nation at large. Sadat introduced his new economic proposals in the October Paper, a blueprint for dismantling parts of the socialist system introduced under Nasser. No Egyptian leader could afford to tamper with the social welfare portions of Nasserism, but Sadat argued that the public sector had become inefficient and uncompetitive. He therefore sought to liberalize the economy by introducing incentives for capitalist investment, both local and foreign.

The new economic program was called "the opening"—al-Infitah—and it contained a broad range of proposals designed to encourage foreign investment. For example, foreign banks were invited to return to Egypt and were offered tax exemptions and favorable terms for repatriating their profits. Foreigners were allowed to import equipment with considerable freedom. Even some of the revolution's founding principles regarding agrarian land were modified as the government made it easier to buy and sell land and to raise land rents. The Infitah offered lucrative opportunities to private-sector enterprises fortunate enough to enjoy linkages with the public sector. Private contractors reaped significant profits from the rebuilding of the cities along the Suez Canal and from a construction boom that took place in Cairo. But despite the improved investment climate created by the lessening of tensions with Israel, foreign capital was not particularly attracted to Egypt. Investors who did take advantage of the Infitah tended to put their money into the purchase or construction of apartment buildings and office towers or into tourist-related ventures such as luxury hotels. They chose low-risk, nonproductive investments over the uncertain performance of Egyptian industry. In those instances where foreigners sought industry-related investments, they were often frustrated by the cumbersome bureaucracy and the resistance of the entrenched public sector.

Adding to the difficulties of Sadat's new economic policies were the same barriers that had constrained Nasser's socialism. Egypt had a staggering foreign debt, mainly to the Soviets for arms purchases; an enormous defense budget; and an inflation rate of over 20 percent. For the ordinary Egyptians who entered the post–October 1973 era with raised expectations, the Infitah was a bitter disappointment. It favored the wealthy few but brought no tangible benefits to the population at large. In this respect the new economic policy appeared to foster the kinds of income disparities that had been condemned in the socialist decrees of the early 1960s.

One existing social welfare program was the subsidization of such basic consumer items as bread, sugar, rice, and tea. Subsidies kept the prices of these staples down, but at a cost to the state of $1.5 billion per year. The International Monetary Fund (IMF) warned Sadat that his government would not qualify for further loans until the funds used for the subsidies were invested in more productive areas. In January 1977, without giving advance notice, Sadat reduced the subsidies on certain items and canceled them altogether on others. The Egyptian population expressed its anger in a devastating outbreak of antigovernment riots. In Cairo, the mobs attacked police stations and ASU headquarters, symbols of the regime's control. Many of the demonstrators' slogans revealed their disenchantment with the empty promises Sadat had made so often since 1973. The cry "O hero of the crossing, where is our breakfast?" stood as a heartfelt rebuke to the state apparatus that could provide propaganda but not food. Sadat finally had to call in the army, the first time it had been deployed against its own civilians since 1952. At least 150 Egyptians were killed as the army crushed the riots. Sadat immediately restored the subsidies in order to prevent further disturbances.

Faced with mounting domestic unrest and the continuing failure of the Infitah, Sadat renewed his diplomatic initiatives in the hope that a settlement of the conflict with Israel would lead to an improvement in Egypt's economic situation. Within ten months of the January 1977 riots, Sadat was in Jerusalem addressing the Israeli Knesset—a clear indication of the close relationship between Egypt's domestic problems and Sadat's foreign policy ventures.

From Jerusalem to Camp David: The Unfolding of the Peace Process

On November 20, 1977, a worldwide television audience watched, many in disbelief, as the president of the major Arab military power flew to Jerusalem and proclaimed to the Israeli parliament Egypt's acceptance of peace with Israel. However conflicting the motives may have been that led to the occasion and however bitter were the disagreements that lay ahead, it was a moving moment.

Sadat's journey to Jerusalem marked the beginning of a new phase of ponderous and sometimes acrimonious peacemaking between Egypt and Israel, with the United States acting as a third party. Negotiations were made all the more difficult by the fact that Sadat and the newly elected Israeli prime minister, Menachem Begin, had different ideas about what they ought to be discussing. Sadat wanted not only to deal with bilateral Egyptian-Israeli relations but also to get agreement on a comprehensive plan for Middle East peace that would include a resolution of the Palestinian issue. But Prime Minister Begin had no intention of relinquishing Israel's hold on the West Bank and Gaza Strip and therefore sought to confine the discussions to Egyptian-Israeli matters.

When disagreement over the issue of Palestinian self-determination threatened to scuttle negotiations, President Jimmy Carter invited Begin and Sadat to Camp David for face-to-face talks. For thirteen wrenching days in September 1978, the three leaders and their staffs engaged in nonstop discussions. The United States attempted to find a middle ground between Sadat's desires for a comprehensive settlement and recognition of Palestinian rights and Begin's uncompromising stand on the West Bank and Gaza Strip. The end result was the Camp David Accords, which the three heads of state signed on September 17, 1978.

The Camp David Accords consisted of two major documents. The most straightforward of them set forth the conditions for an Egyptian-Israeli peace treaty. The other, titled "A Framework for Peace in the Middle East," endorsed UN Resolution 242 as the basis for a durable and comprehensive settlement of the Middle East conflict. In spelling out the future status of the Gaza Strip and the West Bank, it proposed a staged plan for achieving Palestinian autonomy over a period of five years. However, the proposal was open-ended and based on assumptions that never materialized. It was also so vaguely worded that it was subject to differing interpretations, which was exactly what Begin wanted. The framework for peace was a victory for the Israeli prime minister and a defeat for the idea of a Palestinian state. At Camp David, Israel won the right to deal with the occupied territories as it saw fit, even if that was not immediately apparent to Sadat and Carter.

On March 26, 1979, Sadat and Begin signed a formal Egyptian-Israeli treaty in Washington. During the following year, the two countries exchanged ambassadors, and Israel began its staged withdrawal from Sinai, an operation that was completed in 1982 with the assistance of a $3 billion contribution from the United States. As for the framework for peace, it was never implemented, despite protests and urgings from the United States and Egypt. Begin had managed to exchange Sinai for control of the West Bank and Gaza Strip and had in the process neutralized the most powerful Arab military machine. In the absence of a comprehensive peace settlement, there was no disguising that Sadat had done nothing more than conclude a separate peace with Israel. The US administration was grateful, but the Arab world was shocked.

Egypt paid a high price in inter-Arab relations for its treaty with Israel. Egypt was expelled from the Arab League, league headquarters were transferred to Tunis, and all of the Arab states, with the exceptions of Oman and the Sudan, broke diplomatic relations with Cairo. In addition, the oil-producing states canceled their subsidies, making Egypt economically dependent on the West, especially the United States. Once the driving force behind the movement for Arab unity, Egypt was now isolated from the Arab world.

The Islamist Opposition

One of the reasons the regime was subject to criticism was the continued failure of the Infitah to secure material improvement for the majority of Egyptians. Even after the treaty with Israel and the delivery of large amounts of US aid, foreign investment was minimal. Those who did profit from the economic liberalization, many of whom were the president's friends and relatives, engaged in ostentatious displays of wealth that only served to remind the majority of Egyptians how unsatisfactory their own circumstances were. Moreover, Sadat's behavior created a certain distance between him and the Egyptian people and undermined the popularity he had achieved during the crossing of 1973. In contrast to the austere Nasser, Sadat enjoyed the trappings and the realities of power. He acquired villas and mansions and even set up a presidential office in one of the old royal palaces in Cairo. His extravagances led the masses to refer to him as Faruq II or the khedive, a reference to the nineteenth-century ruler Isma'il. In addition, the prominent public role assumed by Sadat's wife, Jehan, was offensive to some quarters of Egyptian society.

The treaty with Israel provided a further source of discontent. Although the treaty received approval in a national referendum, many Egyptians felt a sense of unease about reaching an accommodation with an Israeli state that continued to occupy the Gaza Strip, the West Bank, and East Jerusalem, with its venerated Islamic shrines. There was also popular resentment over Egypt's isolation from the Arab Islamic world and the country's growing dependence on the United States. These various cross-currents of dissatisfaction found their primary outlet in the formation of Islamic opposition movements.

When Sadat assumed the presidency in 1970, he feared that elements of the political Left posed the greatest threat to his tenuous hold on power. He sought to counter this threat by allowing representatives of what was known as “the Islamic tendency” to return to the political arena. Sadat released long-imprisoned members of the Muslim Brotherhood and authorized the brotherhood to publish its periodical, al-Da‘wa (The Call), which rapidly achieved a circulation of over 100,000. In addition, Sadat used Islamic symbols to bolster his political legitimacy. He gave himself the title “the believer-president” and used the Egyptian media to cultivate an image of personal piety.

By permitting Islamic issues and symbols to become a prominent part of public discourse, Sadat unleashed forces that came to pose a major challenge to his regime. Despite his attempts to portray himself as a pious Muslim, his lavish style of living, his and his wife's preference for European designer clothes, and his agreement to a treaty with Israel all served to make him a target of criticism for the Islamic forces he had originally tried to manipulate. The most militant opposition was organized by Egyptian youth and was expressed in Islamic terms.

The Egyptian situation during the 1970s differed from Iran's in that, during the Nasser era, the state had largely taken over the Egyptian religious establishment. The ulama were state employees, and their tendency to mouth the slogans of the regime caused Egyptians to cynically refer to them as "pulpit parrots." Moreover, the Sunni Egyptian religious officials did not receive the same veneration as the Iranian ayatollahs, who were the representatives of the Hidden Imam and were therefore empowered to interpret God's commands. Because the Egyptian religious establishment was not independent of the state, the Islamic opposition in Egypt originated among lay members of society. Two dimensions of Islamic protest against Sadat's regime concern us here: The first is the university student movement; the second is the violent opposition on the part of organizations determined to overthrow the regime and replace it with an Islamic government.

As the hopes kindled by the relative success of the 1973 war with Israel began to recede in the bleak economic failure of the Infitah, students on Egypt's teeming university campuses began to express their discontent through the formation of Islamic associations. Between 1974 and 1979 and again in the late 1980s and early 1990s, such associations gained control of most of the student organizations of Egypt's major universities. In part, the success of the Islamic student associations rested with their ability to identify the unsuitable conditions of campus life, to propose changes to them, and to place those changes within an Islamic frame of reference. For example, the groups campaigned for separate classrooms for male and female students on the grounds that the existing overcrowded circumstances subjected female students to harassment. They also encouraged the adoption of Islamic attire and sought to ban alcohol and Western music concerts from the campuses. In addition, Islamic student associations formed off-campus study groups, distributed free copies of professors' lecture booklets, and offered a sense of belonging and acceptable settings for socialization to the thousands of young people who had come from small towns and villages to the large cities.

The associations also offered hope that society could be changed and student prospects improved. The lack of employment opportunities for even the most successful students engendered a bitterness toward Sadat's regime: "Once the ex-student has acquired a diploma . . . he will then work each morning as an underpaid state employee, and spend the afternoon moonlighting as an amateur plumber, as a taxi driver who knows neither the streets nor the routes, or as some sort of jobber."¹ In drawing attention to the intolerable conditions on the university campuses and the bleak futures of university graduates and in proposing to change those circumstances by the Islamization of society, the Islamic student organizations touched a raw nerve and became a potent opposition force.

The second dimension to Egypt's Islamic protest movement was provided by militant underground organizations. By the late 1970s, there were as many as twenty such groups operating in Egypt, but two of them, al-Takfir wa al-Hijrah (Excommunication and Emigration) and al-Jihad (Sacred Struggle), achieved special notoriety. Although there were differences between the two, both organizations found their ideological inspiration in the writings of Sayyid Qutb, a member of the Muslim Brotherhood whom the Nasser regime had executed in 1966. His Ma'alim fi al-Tariq (Signposts on the Road), written while Qutb was in prison and published in 1964, stated that the primary function of government was to ensure the enforcement of God's law. As long as rulers carried out that function, it was incumbent upon Muslims to obey them. But once rulers ceased to base their legislation on the shari'ah, they and their governments were no longer Islamic—they were jahiliyyah, ignorant of Islam. Qutb argued that true Muslims were bound to disobey jahiliyyah governments and to destroy them by whatever means necessary in order to restore the shari'ah. Such governments, because they were non-Islamic, were legitimate objects of jihad, sacred struggle in the cause of Islam. In Qutb's view, the Nasser regime was in a state of jahiliyyah; in the view of his younger disciples, Sadat's government fell into the same category.

Both al-Takfir and al-Jihad called for the violent overthrow of Sadat's impious regime by a vanguard of purified Muslims who would then restore the shari‘ah. Interviews conducted by Egyptian scholars revealed that the membership of the organizations, though comprising a share of semiliterate slum dwellers, was dominated by university students and recent graduates, many of whom had entered into the most demanding—and the most secular—faculties, such as medicine, pharmacy, and engineering. These students and graduates tended to come from small towns and villages to urban universities, where they experienced the alienation of city life. They turned to the Islamic associations of their upbringing as an anchor in a society they found morally confusing and economically unpromising. Their disillusionment over their prospects for employment and their search for an Islamic alternative to the society in which they should have achieved status and opportunity, but had not, stood as a glaring condemnation of the state’s failure to offer them hope for the future.

In 1977, members of al-Takfir wa al-Hijrah took hostage a former minister of religious endowments in order to force the release of imprisoned members of their organization. When the government refused to deal with the kidnappers, they killed their hostage. The regime retaliated by arresting and executing the leaders of al-Takfir and imprisoning scores of young Islamic militants. From that point until the death of Sadat, his regime and the Islamic organizations were in open confrontation. When Egypt signed the treaty with Israel in 1979, the leaders of al-Jihad condemned Sadat for surrendering Jerusalem to the Jews. The organization claimed that Sadat was an infidel, that he was in a state of jahiliyyah, and that he was a ruler to whom the duty of jihad applied. Sadat recognized the danger posed by the Islamic opposition, and in September 1981, he ordered the arrest and imprisonment of over 1,000 individuals suspected of plotting against his regime.

On October 6, 1981, not long after his preemptive political strike against the Islamic organizations, Sadat reviewed a military parade held to celebrate the eighth anniversary of the crossing. When one of the vehicles in the long line of US-made carriers paused in front of the reviewing stand, the hero of the crossing himself stood to salute its occupants. They returned his gesture with a hail of gunfire. The assassins, members of al-Jihad, brought a sudden and perplexing end to the regime of this flawed but fascinating Egyptian president. His assassination was intended to remove a non-Islamic despot and to usher in a popular revolution that would lead to the establishment of a proper Islamic state. Although there were disturbances in several cities following Sadat's death, there were no mass uprisings, and the central state survived intact. Sadat was succeeded by his vice president, Husni Mubarak, whose regime will be examined later in this chapter.

THE LEBANESE CIVIL WAR, 1975–1990

The First Phase, 1975–1976

Following the 1967 June War, the Palestinian-Israeli conflict intruded on Lebanese political life. This development, in combination with demographic and political changes taking place inside Lebanon itself, upset the country's fragile sectarian balance and plunged it into fifteen years of vicious and destructive civil war. The civil war was not an exclusively Lebanese affair; it was precipitated by the Palestinian presence in the country and soon attracted external intervention by Syria and Israel, thus bringing to an end the attempts of Lebanon's political bosses to insulate their country from the wider regional conflict.

After the events of Black September in 1970, the Palestinian commando organizations moved their base of operations to Lebanon, where they joined 300,000 Palestinian refugees who were already present in the country. The majority of them lived in camps in southern Lebanon, and it was in and around the camps that the bulk of the guerrilla groups settled. The commandos' freedom to undertake military operations against Israel was based on a 1969 agreement in which the Lebanese government turned over the supervision of the refugee camps to the PLO in exchange for the PLO's pledge to obtain the government's consent for any armed incursions it might make.

This latter restriction went largely unheeded, and from 1970 onward, the cycle of Palestinian raids into Israel and Israeli retaliation in force repeated itself countless times. The Israeli bombing attacks affected not only the Palestinians but also the mainly Shi'a villagers of southern Lebanon, thousands of whom abandoned their homes and migrated to the squatter suburbs of Beirut, embittered against a government unable to protect them from either Palestinians or Israelis. The relative ease with which Israeli forces were able to execute commando raids of their own, exemplified by a strike against Beirut International Airport in 1968 and the assassination of three Palestinian leaders in Beirut in 1973, caused an outcry from Arab nationalists and radical reformers against the government. They accused the authorities of failing to deploy the Lebanese army against Israel and of using it instead to frustrate the activities of the Palestinian commandos. This accusation illuminated the crux of the issue deeply dividing the people of Lebanon: Were the Palestinian commandos to be allowed unrestricted freedom to conduct raids against Israel with the inevitable Israeli armed response, or should the Lebanese state attempt to retain control of the commandos' activities?

Support for the Palestinians came primarily from Muslims alienated by the existing system, which benefited the political bosses and their associates but failed to provide basic social services to broad sections of the population. By the early 1970s, a poverty belt of at least 500,000 inhabitants, most of them rural migrants, surrounded Beirut's suburbs. Some had been driven from their villages by the Israeli raids in the south; others were forced to leave the countryside because the government did not fund the irrigation and transportation services that were needed for commercial agriculture. The failings of the central government were particularly evident during the presidency of Sulayman Frangieh (1970–1976), who abandoned the reformist programs of President Shihab and reverted to nepotism and corruption.

The sectarian arrangements that continued to favor the country's Christians compounded Muslims' social and economic grievances. Long before the crisis of the 1970s, Lebanon's political leaders recognized that Muslims outnumbered Christians—the Shi'a Muslim community was the largest single religious grouping in the country. Largely ignored in the distribution of confessional powers during the mandate years, the Shi'as in the 1970s asserted their sectarian majority and demanded their fair share of the political and economic pie. The Christians were not inclined to give it to them, insisting that the interwar agreements that set a parliamentary ratio of six Christian deputies for every five Muslim deputies remain in effect. The underprivileged and underrepresented Muslims, both Sunni and Shi'a, reacted to the Christian leaders' intransigence by identifying with the Palestinians, a community that was also opposed to the status quo.

With the alteration of its demographic balance and the new pressures placed upon it to assume a role in the regional Arab-Israeli conflict, the Lebanon of the 1970s was no longer the Lebanon of the 1932 census or the 1943 National Pact. The political leader who most clearly recognized these changes was Kamal Jumblatt, the leader of the Druze community. As indicated in Chapter 16, Jumblatt was not just an established za‘im; he was also a political and social reformer able to attract a following beyond the confines of the Druze community. In 1969, Jumblatt forged a loose coalition of discontented Muslims into a front known as the Lebanese National Movement. Committed to administrative reform, the abolition of the confessional basis of politics, and freedom of action for the Palestinian commandos, the Lebanese National Movement became a major factor in the civil war.

Standing in direct opposition to Jumblatt’s National Movement and to the Palestinian presence in Lebanon were the Maronite political leaders. The Maronites prospered under the existing confessional political system and were prepared to use armed force to resist changes. The most uncompromising Maronite leaders were Pierre Gemayel, head of the paramilitary Phalange, and former president Camille Chamoun, who had his own private militia, the Tigers. When it became evident to these politicians that the government and the army were incapable of taking decisive action against the Palestinians, they resolved to do so themselves.

In preparation for their confrontation with the Palestinians, the Christian militias embarked on a large-scale program of arms procurement. The PLO and the leftist organizations did the same, and by spring 1975, all factions within Lebanon were armed to the teeth. The spark that ignited this explosive situation came in April, when the Phalange attacked a busload of Palestinians and killed twenty-seven of the passengers. This set off a round of fighting between the PLO and the Maronite militias that lasted until the end of June, when the main PLO forces accepted a cease-fire and withdrew from the fighting for the remainder of the year.

However, the PLO’s disengagement did not resolve the differences between the Lebanese themselves, and in August 1975, fighting broke out between Muslim and Christian militias. The Muslim groups in general supported Jumblatt’s Lebanese National Movement; the Christian forces were spearheaded by the Maronite Phalange. From their fortified positions in Beirut's high-rise office towers and luxury hotels, the opposing sides engaged in artillery duels that transformed the core of the cosmopolitan city into a war zone and reduced it to blackened ruins. In December, the conflict took an even more ominous turn as the Phalange and its allies began expelling Muslims who resided within those areas of Beirut controlled by the Maronite forces. This action intensified the sectarian divisions within the city and made the possibility of a return to confessional cooperation still more remote.

The PLO, whose presence in Lebanon was one of the main causes of the civil war, had managed to avoid becoming entangled in the fighting after its brief confrontation with the Maronites. But in January 1976, the Phalange and its Maronite allies formed a coalition known as the Lebanese Front and laid siege to the large Palestinian refugee camp of Tal al-Za‘tar located in the suburbs of Beirut. Because the PLO’s base of support came from Palestinian refugees, the siege of Tal al-Za‘tar drew the organization back into the conflict. At the same time, the Lebanese army began to disintegrate into its confessional components, as officers and troops defected in order to join militia organizations that reflected their religious affiliations. Without an army and without an effective central government, Lebanon plunged deeper and deeper into the chaos of civil war.

The war was expanded and then brought temporarily to an end by Syrian intervention. In May 1976, President al-Asad of Syria sent his army into Lebanon to rescue the Christian militias from the battering they were taking at the hands of the PLO and Jumblatt’s forces. Al-Asad’s choice of allies was perplexing because it created a situation in which Syrian troops and Maronite militiamen fought side by side against the PLO and the forces of the National Movement. Whatever al-Asad’s motives may have been for supporting the Maronite faction, Syria’s invasion of Lebanon escalated the fighting and expanded the level of destruction.

On October 18, 1976, Syria and the PLO accepted a cease-fire drawn up by Arab heads of state, and the worst of the fighting came to a halt. The terms of the agreement provided for an Arab deterrent force to be stationed in Lebanon to maintain law and order. In reality, the force was composed almost exclusively of Syrian troops whose presence enabled al-Asad to continue his efforts to shape the Lebanese situation to suit the needs of Damascus. The cease-fire agreement allowed the PLO to retain the same status it had enjoyed before the war. Once it came into effect, Palestinian commando units returned to their old bases in southern Lebanon and prepared to resume their activities against Israel.

Although the civil war eroded the power of the central Lebanese state, it did not move Lebanese politicians to abandon the confessional system or to amend the formula by which political representation was allocated. It was as though the destruction of Beirut, the deaths of 30,000 to 40,000 people, and the invasion of Syrian forces had failed to resolve any of Lebanon's prewar problems. In the years from 1976 to 1982, the country disintegrated into a collection of sectarian enclaves, each defended by its own militia organization. Warfare between militia factions became a way of life, and the name Lebanon, which had once stood as a symbol for sectarian harmony, became synonymous with mindless violence. Attempts by President Elias Sarkis (1976–1982) to rebuild the army and to effect reconciliation foundered on private militias' unwillingness to disband and on the suspicions and distrust of a people who had experienced the brutalities of civil war. Those brutalities frequently resurfaced, notably with the assassination of Kamal Jumblatt in 1977. His followers assumed the assassin was a Maronite and took vengeance on members of that community. And so it went, moments of hope and plans for reconstruction dashed by the explosion of car bombs and the ring of snipers' bullets.

The 1982 Israeli Invasion of Lebanon

When Israeli troops crossed the border into Lebanon in June 1982, they launched what would become Israel's longest and most controversial war. In the course of the three-month operation, the Israeli Defense Forces not only engaged units of the PLO; they also placed an Arab capital city—Beirut—under siege and contributed to the deaths of hundreds of Lebanese and Palestinian civilians. Menachem Begin's government planned and conducted the invasion intended to facilitate his goal of annexing the occupied West Bank.

For Begin, the PLO provided the connection between the West Bank and Lebanon. He believed that if Israel could drive the PLO's armed factions from Lebanon, then the Palestinians in the West Bank would be isolated and more susceptible to Israeli annexation. The situation in Lebanon invited Israel's attention because of the continuing weakness of the Lebanese government, whose authority scarcely extended beyond the capital. As it had done before the civil war, the PLO took advantage of this weakness to assume a degree of administrative autonomy in a belt that stretched from the organization's headquarters in West Beirut south to the Israeli border. This was that belt the Israeli government wished to destroy. Its first concerted effort to do so occurred in 1978, when 25,000 Israeli troops invaded Lebanon as far north as the Litani River. The operation failed to dislodge the PLO from its strongholds, although it did cause large-scale demographic disruptions in southern Lebanon as thousands of villagers, mainly Shi'as, fled their homelands for the area of Beirut. Pressure from the United States and the UN eventually compelled Israel to withdraw its troops. At the same time, the United Nations Interim Forces in Lebanon (UNIFIL) were installed in southern Lebanon in an attempt to provide a buffer between Israel and the PLO. The 1978 invasion brought home two lessons for Begin's government: First, military action that confined itself to southern Lebanon alone could not eliminate the presence of Palestinian guerrillas in Lebanon; second, the influence of the Palestinians in Lebanese affairs could not be eradicated without resolving the broader issue of Lebanon's political instability.

With these lessons in mind, Begin and Minister of Defense Sharon devised a plan they hoped would solve Lebanon's lingering crisis in a way that would work to Israel's advantage. The plan had three main objectives: the destruction of the PLO as a fighting force; the withdrawal of the Syrian occupying troops, whose presence in Lebanon brought them uncomfortably close to Israel; and the forging of a mutually advantageous alliance with the dominant Maronite faction. This faction was led by Bashir Gemayel, who became the instrument through which Israel sought to reconstruct the Lebanese state.

Bashir was the younger son of Pierre Gemayel, the founder and titular leader of the Phalange. In the period of instability following the first phase of the civil war, Bashir became commander of the Lebanese Forces, a military organization made up of several different Christian militias. Determined to perpetuate the Phalangist version of Maronite domination in Lebanon, Bashir engaged in a ruthless and successful campaign to destroy the autonomy of the other militias and bring them under his direct command. During the late 1970s and early 1980s, he had extensive contacts with Israeli officials, with whom he shared a dislike for the Palestinian and Syrian presence in Lebanon. By spring 1982, the groundwork for cooperation between Gemayel and the Israeli government had been laid.

Israel launched a huge invasion, known as “Peace for Galilee,” on June 6, 1982; its publicly stated purpose was the destruction of the PLO bases in southern Lebanon. However, the real objectives of the Israeli government were far more ambitious. Peace for Galilee was designed not only to clear the PLO bases from southern Lebanon but also to destroy the PLO infrastructure in West Beirut and to ensure the election of Bashir Gemayel as president of Lebanon. In the view of the Israeli cabinet, such an outcome would establish a stable and cooperative government in Beirut and leave Israel with a free hand in the occupied territories.

The deliberate misleading of Israeli and world opinion concerning the planned scope of the military operations was one of the reasons for the strong reaction against the invasion. Another was the terrible toll it took in civilian lives. Within days of launching the invasion, Israeli forces pushed beyond their stated objectives and reached the outskirts of Beirut. At that point, Defense Minister Sharon ordered Lebanon’s capital city placed under siege. Throughout summer 1982, West Beirut, the area of PLO concentration, was subjected to intense air, sea, and land bombardments that caused heavy casualties among the predominantly civilian population. The PLO remained defiant in the face of the Israeli siege, and the Israeli government was reluctant to order its forces to take West Beirut in house-to-house fighting because of the high casualty rate that would result.

Finally, international efforts at mediation, mounting domestic criticism within Israel, and deteriorating conditions in West Beirut combined to produce an agreement for the withdrawal of the PLO forces. The agreement, signed on August 18, called for France and the United States to head a multinational force to supervise the evacuation of the PLO fighters; it also provided guarantees for the safety of the Palestinian civilians who would be left behind. By September 1, the evacuation was completed and the US forces were withdrawn.

When in late August Bashir Gemayel was chosen as Lebanon’s president, it appeared the Israeli government had achieved all of its objectives. Two weeks after his election, however, Gemayel was assassinated, and the Sharon-Begin scheme began to unravel. In the wake of the assassination, Israel violated the evacuation agreement by sending its army into West Beirut. Instead of protecting the civilians as it claimed it was doing, the Israeli military allowed units of the Phalange to enter the Palestinian refugee camps of Sabra and Shatila and to massacre over 1,000 men, women, and children who had been left unprotected by the PLO evacuation.

The atrocities at Sabra and Shatila produced an international outcry against the entire Lebanese operation and a wave of revulsion within Israel. Members of the Israeli Defense Forces spoke out against the invasion, and large segments of the Israeli population continued to question the reasons for engaging in a conflict that took so many lives at a time when the survival of the state was not threatened. In response to the criticism, the government created a board of inquiry, the Kahan Commission, to investigate the events at Sabra and Shatila. The commission found that Israeli officials, both civilian and military, were indirectly responsible for the massacres. Defense Minister Sharon's role was singled out, and he was forced to resign his portfolio. The Lebanon war destroyed Begin's political career. Disillusioned by the failure of his plans and troubled by the high casualty rates among the Israeli soldiers who had died in futile pursuit of his goals, Begin resigned the prime ministership in 1983 and withdrew completely from public life up to his death in 1992.

The effect of the Lebanon war on the PLO was profound. Deprived of the autonomous Lebanese base that had sustained it on Israel's northern border for over a decade, the organization moved its headquarters to Tunis, some 2,000 miles (3,200 kilometers) away from the territories it sought to liberate. Although Arafat and his associates retained control of the PLO, the organization was less cohesive and more vulnerable to pressures from the Arab states than it had previously been.

In 1983, the Israelis undertook a protracted evacuation that lasted until 1985 and even then was incomplete. Israel continued to occupy a security zone in the south, a zone that made up roughly 10 percent of Lebanese territory. As long as Israeli forces remained in Lebanon (and they did not finally withdraw until 2000), they were subject to attacks by local armed groups claiming the right to liberate their country from occupation.

In the aftermath of the partial Israeli withdrawal, the new Lebanese president, Amin Gemayel, brother of the murdered Bashir, was faced with armed opposition from Druze and Shi'a militias. Feeling abandoned by the United States and Israel, he turned in desperation to the Syrians to save his government, who were only too willing to help and began deploying its troops in support of Gemayel. Nothing more vividly demonstrated the failure of Israel's plans to manipulate the situation in Lebanon than this latest twist: In 1985, Syria's position in the country was more firmly entrenched than it had been at any time since the outbreak of the civil war a decade earlier. And in that same year, armed Palestinian guerrillas reestablished themselves in southern Lebanon.

The Taif Accord of 1989

For most of the decade following the Israeli invasion of 1982, Lebanon suffered from armed violence and governmental paralysis. Muslim and Christian militia groups continued their mutually destructive combat, and armed elements of the PLO attempted to reestablish their presence in the country. The dispossessed Shi'a community awakened to political self-consciousness and rallied behind two militant organizations, Amal and Hizballah (Party of God), for the achievement of its political and religious goals. Outside forces also contributed to the tension and disorder: The Israeli-occupied zone was a constant source of friction in the south; in the central and eastern regions, 40,000 Syrian troops stood ready to enforce decisions made in Damascus; and the Shi'a group Hizballah, operating on funds provided by Iran, called for the establishment of an Islamic state in Lebanon.

The conflict was so prolonged in Lebanon because the Lebanese religious communities could not agree on political reform. The essential problem was that the power allotted to the main religious communities in Lebanon's confessional political system no longer reflected the country's demographic realities. The restoration of government required the reworking of the constitution and the National Pact so as to reflect the Muslim majority (see Chapter 12). Any such reform would diminish the political power of the Maronites, a prospect so unpalatable to some Maronite leaders that they preferred the partition of Lebanon and the establishment of a separate Maronite homeland.

After the failure of several compromise proposals during the 1980s, Lebanon's politicians were brought together under the auspices of the Arab League in 1989. The setting was unusual, to say the least. The meeting was held not in Lebanon but in the Saudi Arabian town of Taif. The delegates at Taif consisted of the surviving members of the last Lebanese parliament (elected in 1972) plus replacements for those who had died in the intervening years. This unique assemblage managed to hammer out a national reconciliation pact that granted Muslims a greater role in Lebanon's political system. The major change was a transfer of some of the powers of the presidency to the prime minister and the cabinet. By reducing the authority of the Maronite president in favor of the Muslim prime minister, the Taif accord recognized the changed composition of the population. A second important feature of the agreement was to change the religious representation in parliament from the existing six-to-five ratio in favor of Christians to an equal number of seats for Muslims and Christians. This was achieved by adding nine new Muslim seats, three of which were assigned to the Shi'a community. Far from eliminating confessionalism, the Taif accord vigorously affirmed religious identity as the core of Lebanese politics.

The agreement also acknowledged the existence of a special relationship between Lebanon and Syria. It called for extending the authority of the Beirut government over the entire country and requested the militias to disband and surrender their heavy weapons to the Lebanese army. This seemingly unlikely development was, according to the language of the agreement, to be facilitated by Syrian assistance. In effect, the delegates at Taif agreed to the use of Syrian armed force to implement the accord. Syria's military presence in Lebanon also gave Damascus extensive influence over Lebanese politics and, for that very reason, convinced elements within the Christian community to forcefully resist the Taif agreement.

The Rebellion of General Michel Aoun, 1989–1990

In the months preceding the Taif Conference, the contorted twists and turns of civil war politics produced a situation that was complicated and unwieldy even by Lebanese standards. President Amin Gemayel's term expired in September 1988, but the quarreling factions of militia leaders and politicians could not agree on a successor. Just before leaving office, Gemayel appointed the commander in chief of the Lebanese armed forces, General Michel Aoun, a Maronite Christian, as acting prime minister. At this point, the sitting Muslim prime minister, Salim al-Huss, declared that he and his cabinet constituted the legitimate government of Lebanon. The existence of two competing governments, one headed by a Maronite Christian, the other by a Sunni Muslim, threatened to permanently divide Lebanon—a situation that finally pushed the Lebanese politicians to agree to the Taif meeting. Most of the established Maronite leaders were prepared to accept the Syrian overlordship implied in the Taif accord in exchange for a chance at peace. Aoun was not.

Portraying himself as a Lebanese patriot rather than a Maronite particularist, Aoun proclaimed a war of liberation against the Syrian presence in the country and began a military campaign to drive Syrian troops from Lebanon. His two-year rebellion was the most destructive and deadly episode in Lebanon's fifteen years of civil war. Fierce artillery battles in and around Beirut ravaged the city's residential sections and killed over 1,000 civilians. At first, Aoun's stubborn stand against Syria attracted a certain amount of support from Muslims as well as Christians, but his recklessness and callous disregard for civilian lives soon turned most Lebanese against him. By early 1990, Aoun's forces were fighting not only Syrians and Lebanese Muslims but also gunmen from the major Maronite militia, whose leaders had decided he posed a threat to whatever future Lebanon might have.

This confusing and tragic rebellion was brought to an end in October 1990. While the world's attention was focused on the crisis created by Iraq's invasion of Kuwait, Syrian air and ground forces launched an all-out attack on Aoun's positions. Aoun escaped to asylum in the French embassy as Syrian tanks took control of the rubble-strewn streets of Beirut.

With Aoun's defeat, the Lebanese temporarily abandoned armed confrontation in favor of mutual cooperation to implement the Taif accord. Under a new president, Ilyas Hrawi, and a pro-Syrian cabinet, the government began the delicate task of disarming the militias and restoring the authority of the Lebanese army. Yet even as Lebanon returned to a semblance of normalcy and embarked on a phase of postwar reconstruction, two persistent problems threatened the delicate balance that had been achieved at Taif. First, the very nature of the civil war had tended to deepen sectarian identities. In the dangerous conditions of a society at war with itself, individuals sought safety in communities of their coreligionists. Members of other religious communities, no matter how nonsectarian they may have been personally, came to be viewed as enemies. Thus Lebanon entered its postwar existence with communal identities more solidified than ever. The second problem was in the south. As long as Israel occupied portions of the Shi'a heartland in southern Lebanon, the two major Shi'a militias, Amal and Hizbullah, would not voluntarily turn in their weapons. The situation was rendered more complicated by the PLO's success in restoring a measure of its former autonomy in the region, a development the Shi'a opposed. Once again, the wider regional conflict intruded upon Lebanon and made the healing of that country's internal divisions dependent on a resolution of the conflicts that gripped the Middle East as a whole.

EGYPT IN THE 1980s

The 1980s were a difficult decade for Egypt. Sadat's successor, Husni Mubarak (b. 1928), faced a daunting series of diplomatic and domestic challenges, few of which he addressed decisively. As a result, Egypt drifted into political and economic paralysis.

When Sadat appointed Mubarak as vice president in 1975, he proclaimed that the torch of leadership was being passed to the October generation. Like his two predecessors, Mubarak was a military officer from modest origins. Unlike them, he showed no interest in political activity while serving as a young officer; he was a professional soldier instilled with the military's sense of hierarchy and methods of decision making. After graduating from the Egyptian military academy, Mubarak received flight training in the Soviet Union and later served as commander of the Egyptian air force during the October War. As president, his caution and lack of public dynamism distinguished him from Nasser and Sadat. Nevertheless, he demonstrated a remarkable capacity to remain in power.

The qualities that favored such longevity in office were not those that guaranteed decisive leadership. Mubarak's principal goal was to ensure the survival of the regime by introducing a minimum of structural adjustments while appearing to liberalize political and economic practices. His reluctance to support significant reforms and his inability to present a compelling vision of the country's future brought stagnation to all areas of Egyptian national life.

During his early years in office, Mubarak appeared to be guiding Egypt toward a more democratic political system. The 1984 elections were the most open since 1952. They took on the appearance of a new era of political freedom due to the government's decision to permit the Wafd Party to enter candidates in the election after thirty-two years of banishment. The Wafd gained control of enough seats to become the largest opposition bloc within parliament. However, the Wafd soon became divided, and the regime's retreat from further political liberalization dampened the excitement that had greeted its return. After 1984, the state introduced tighter controls over oppositional political activity and used its full range of powers, from patronage to intimidation to blatant electoral fraud, to ensure the election of government candidates. These were not new practices in post-1952 Egypt, but their use by a regime that had no purpose other than to stay in power and by a president who inspired little popular confidence served only to alienate the public and to engender apathy toward the controlled electoral process.

The economic policies of the regime reflected a similar tendency to preserve the status quo. Mubarak continued Sadat's commitment to a mixed public-sector/private-sector economy and resisted pressures from the United States and the International Monetary Fund to accelerate economic privatization. Domestic political considerations made it very difficult for the state to divest itself of the public-sector industries, no matter how inefficient they might have been. The most crucial factor in the public's acceptance of the regime rested in its ability to offer employment. The extent of the state's role as employer is made strikingly apparent by statistics showing that, in 1986, 4.8 million Egyptians were on the public payroll; this figure constituted 10 percent of the country's entire population and 35 percent of the labor force.²

Political constraints also shaped the regime's policies toward the private sector. During the Infitah, a prosperous entrepreneurial class emerged and acquired sufficient influence within ruling circles to make it politically risky for the state to attempt to curtail its business activities. The result was a growing gap between the top of the economic ladder—the prosperous private sector and the upper echelons of the state bureaucracy—and the mass of state employees, whose wages shrank and working conditions declined. In this situation, corruption became widespread. It was normal for state officials to augment their incomes by entering into arrangements with private-sector entrepreneurs in which the officials would issue special import permits or waive licensing requirements in exchange for a share of the private company's profits. These and other extralegal activities made a mockery of the state's regulatory machinery and contributed to attitudes of cynicism toward the regime as a whole.

The treaty with Israel, the new relationship with the United States, and domestic economic needs determined the main orientation of Mubarak's foreign policy. The restrictive nature of these three factors became evident during the Israeli invasion of Lebanon, when Egypt, once the main confrontation state, stood on the sidelines while the Israeli military closed in on Beirut. Mubarak had no choice but to honor the peace treaty and thus preserve Egypt's close relationship with the United States and the generous economic assistance it brought. But in doing so, he highlighted Egypt's diminished regional status and its new international realignment.

During the 1980s, Egypt received $2.2 billion a year in economic assistance from the United States, second only to the amount the United States provided Israel. Critics of Egypt's growing economic dependence on US aid voiced concerns that the country was also losing its foreign policy independence and becoming a puppet of US objectives in the Middle East. The specific projects funded by US economic assistance and the methods by which they were selected also came under criticism. It often appeared that US priorities, not Egyptian ones, were driving Egypt's development strategy. In addition, as Egypt's military was rebuilt in the American image, Egypt began to accumulate a sizable debt for its purchases of advanced US weaponry. Economic necessity drove Egypt into the US embrace, but many opponents of the relationship, both within and outside Egypt, questioned Mubarak's wisdom in turning his country into "America's Egypt."

Despite the obstacles that the US alliance and the treaty with Israel posed to Egypt's reintegration within the Arab world, Mubarak successfully achieved this task. As a result of his patient diplomacy, Egypt was readmitted to the Arab League in 1989, and two years later, Cairo regained its designation as League headquarters. But the Arab world Egypt reentered was much different from the one it had been in 1979. Egypt was no longer the single-most dominant Arab state, and its ability to influence regional events was noticeably weaker than it had previously been.

Under President Mubarak, the Islamic organizations continued their activities, and Egyptian society at large continued to demand the restoration of Islam to a prominent position in public life. Although the violence of the radical minority groups subsided during the 1980s, Islam's attraction as a mainstream opposition movement increased. The Muslim Brotherhood, once the spearhead of Islamic militancy, became the representative of the moderate, centrist Islamic political movement. It expanded its influence on university campuses and gained control of the boards of the leading professional organizations (physicians, lawyers, and engineers). In keeping with its original mission, the Brotherhood also worked with volunteer organizations engaged in medical, educational, and social welfare activities. Although the regime prohibited any religious organization from becoming a recognized political party, some Brotherhood members gained parliamentary seats by running as independents. By the late 1980s, deputies from the Brotherhood and sympathizers from the legal parties had formed the largest opposition bloc in parliament. This provided them with a public forum in which to express their demands for revising Egypt's secular statutes. The government responded to these pressures by pledging to review existing laws to see that they conformed to the shari'ah and by banning alcohol in all nontourist areas. Such gestures may have demonstrated the government's awareness of the latent power of the Islamic impulse within society, but they did nothing to resolve the causes of popular disaffection that had led to the Islamic resurgence in the first place. As the regime tinkered ineffectively at the edges of Egypt's problems, ever-greater numbers of Egyptians embraced the possibility of an Islamic-inspired solution to the economic hardships, social malaise, and cultural alienation for which the secular state was held responsible.

CONCLUSION

In October 1973, the Arab world appeared to be united in its support for the Syrian-Egyptian military offensive against the occupying Israeli forces. However, President Sadat's conclusion of a separate peace with Israel in 1979 shattered Arab solidarity and marked the end of the Nasserist vision of Pan-Arabism. In the contest to fill the power vacuum left by Egypt's withdrawal from the anti-Israeli coalition, Syria and Iraq made major bids for regional dominance—the former with its intervention in Lebanon and the latter with its war against Iran (see Chapter 21). At the same time, Saudi Arabia employed its enormous financial strength in an attempt to influence regional developments. Yet none of these three states received universal Arab support for its policies, with the result that the Arab world was once again divided within itself.

The Palestinian military organizations arrived in Lebanon just as that country was experiencing social and demographic changes that weakened the sectarian-based political system and led to a horrible civil war. During the war, the Palestinian organizations retained their autonomy in Lebanon and continued to mount raids into Israel. The Begin government, having secured a peace treaty that neutralized Egypt, invaded Lebanon in hopes of eliminating the PLO as a military force in Lebanon and cutting its ties with the inhabitants of the occupied territories. Although the invasion achieved its military objectives, it did not succeed in ending Palestinian political activity or the chaos in Lebanon.

Although the events and trends discussed in this chapter may appear episodic, they are linked to one another. Taken together, they represent the beginning of a new era of turbulence and uncertainty that extended to other states in the region.

CHAPTER 20

THE ARABIAN PENINSULA IN THE PETROLEUM ERA

In the immediate post–World War II years, the states of the Arabian Peninsula were marginal to the main political and diplomatic issues that preoccupied the Middle East. Impoverished, sparsely populated, and ruled by traditional monarchs with few resources, they were of little international concern except to Britain, which had secured treaty relations with them in order to protect the route to India, and to a few Western companies that had begun exploring for oil in the 1930s. Within three decades, however, these desert states had achieved the highest per capita incomes in the world and become crucial participants in the global economy.

Oil was the resource that transformed the Arabian Peninsula from an isolated preserve of Britain to a world arena. The oil wealth was used, on the one hand, to generate enormous material and social changes in the producing states and, on the other hand, to prevent changes in the political order. The oil states presented seemingly contradictory patterns of modernization and conservatism, of rapid development coupled with political restrictions and the preservation of monarchical rule. Envied and often reviled by their more radical Arab neighbors, they were also courted by the rulers of these same states for their ability to provide copious financial assistance. For the most prosperous oil-producing states, financial aid was a tool of diplomacy designed to silence potential critics and keep restless neighbors from acts of aggression. Despite their vast wealth, the oil-producing states were unable to translate their economic power into military strength. Lacking population reserves and industrial technology, they depended on external patrons to protect their independence. The external power most willing and able to offer military assistance was the United States; but the United States also provided military and economic aid to Israel. How could the Arab oil producers balance their dependence on US military protection with their responsibilities as Arab states? Even within the Arab and Islamic worlds, their position was precarious. How could they, as conservative monarchies, be sympathetic toward the social revolutions in Egypt, Syria, and Iraq or toward the Islamic revolution that swept non-Arab Iran? Yet how could they ignore these neighbors, with their large armies and their rhetoric of social egalitarianism? These were but a few of the dilemmas confronting the Arabian Peninsula states as they transitioned from isolated poverty to international financial prominence.

THE KINGDOM OF SAUDI ARABIA

Patterns of Rule and Foreign Policy to 1973

Unlike the Pahlavi dynasty of Iran or the Hashimite monarchies of Iraq and Jordan, the al-Sa‘ud family had deep roots in the history of the country over which it ruled. The Sa‘udis joined their tribal military forces with the puritanical Islamic ideology of Muhammad ibn Abd al-Wahhab in the eighteenth century to form a confederation that seized control of the holy cities of Mecca and Medina from the Ottoman authorities. Although defeated by Muhammad Ali of Egypt, the family retained a regional power base and reemerged in the twentieth century under the dynamic leadership of Abd al-Aziz ibn Sa‘ud, who created the kingdom that bore his family name (see Chapters 7 and 12).

King Ibn Sa‘ud introduced significant changes into his subjects’ lives, among them the establishment of a central government in place of regional tribal confederations. Yet even as he forged a state, Ibn Sa‘ud adhered to a patriarchal style of rule. He made all policy decisions, and the institutions of government reflected his dominance. At the time of his death in 1953, the kingdom had no constitution, no codes of governmental procedure, no political parties, and no institutionalized forms of consultation. Islam was the ideology through which Ibn Sa‘ud legitimized his family’s right to rule. The Quran was the constitution; the shari‘ah, the law.

The kingdom’s founder was succeeded by his son Sa‘ud, the least competent of the sons who have ruled since his death. King Sa‘ud’s reign (1953–1964) coincided with the emergence of Egyptian president Nasser’s appeal to secular Pan-Arabism and socialism, doctrines that posed a challenge to the Islamic and monarchical foundations on which Sa‘udi rule rested. In addition, domestic changes created by the expanding petroleum industry and the wealth it generated further threatened the conservative social and political order that sustained the royal family. Ill equipped to deal with these challenges, King Sa‘ud opted for hostility toward Nasser during the peak of the Egyptian president’s popularity, a policy that isolated the kingdom in the Arab world and made its royal family a target of Nasser’s attacks on “feudal reactionaries.” Moreover, King Sa‘ud made no distinction between the state treasury and the royal purse, squandering millions of dollars on personal indulgences. His financial irresponsibility drove the state to the brink of bankruptcy, his lack of leadership in foreign policy exposed the kingdom to attack from the radical Arab states, and his behavior became an embarrassment to the royal family. In 1964, a coalition of family members deposed him in favor of Crown Prince Faysal.

Faysal’s reign (1964–1975) transformed Saudi Arabia’s administration, armed forces, educational system, and regional stature. Faysal made the fateful decision in 1973 to participate in the Arab oil embargo, a decision that had the unanticipated results of turning the desert kingdom into a global financial power and making it an object of intense international scrutiny. In some ways, Faysal’s modernization program reflected the policies of the nineteenth-century Ottoman and Egyptian reformers. The king sought to broaden the government’s role so that he could effectively manage the country’s economic development and administer the far-reaching social welfare programs he wished to establish.

To train individuals to staff the new positions in the bureaucracy, Faysal expanded education. The state constructed new university campuses, both religious and secular, and sent thousands of young Saudis abroad to study, mainly at US universities. Faysal then made sure graduates from the local and foreign universities staffed the new ministries and service agencies. Although the new Western-educated elite achieved wider managerial responsibilities, it was the king and selected members of the royal family, operating in secrecy, who determined state policy. Members of the new administrative elite chafed at their exclusion from decision making, yet they were co-opted into accepting the traditional political order by being awarded high offices in the bureaucracy that brought them wealth and prestige. As long as the Saudi royal system rewarded them for their advanced educational training, they were prepared to support that system and to accept the political constraints it embodied.

Yemen as an Issue in Saudi Foreign and Domestic Policy

The most persistent and most immediately threatening foreign policy issue facing the Saudi regime from the early 1960s to the late 1970s was related to developments in the neighboring country of Yemen (see Map 20.1). In September 1962, factions within the Yemeni armed forces carried out a coup against the monarch, Imam Muhammad al-Badr. Inspired and supported by Nasser, the coup leaders abolished the monarchy and proclaimed the existence of the Yemen Arab Republic. However, the rebels had failed to capture Imam Muhammad, and he surfaced in the northern region of the country. When he began rallying tribes in support of his return to the throne, civil war erupted. Neither the republicans nor the royalists could achieve victory, and each party turned to outside powers for aid, thereby transforming a civil war in Arabia's southern tip into a regional conflict.

MAP 20.1. Arabia and the Persian Gulf in the mid-1970s.

As discussed in Chapter 15, the republican regime of Abdallah al-Sallal received military assistance from Nasser, whereas the Saudi government aided the royalists in the north. Egyptian intervention was direct and substantial; by 1966, Egyptian forces in Yemen numbered nearly 70,000, and on several occasions, the Egyptian air force bombed Saudi border towns. King Faysal refused to commit Saudi troops to the conflict for fear they would be defeated, and Saudi aid was therefore confined to providing subsidies and weapons to the royalist forces. Although Nasser's agreement to withdraw his troops following the June War ended the immediate Egyptian threat to the Saudi regime, developments in south Arabia continued to compromise the security of the Saudi monarchy.

In 1967, Britain withdrew from the Aden Protectorate and was replaced by a Marxist National Liberation Front that established the People's Democratic Republic of South Yemen and sought to overthrow all the traditional monarchies in the Arabian Peninsula. The Saudi regime thus faced two hostile Yemens, both with radical governments, both supported by the Soviet Union, and both committed to the establishment of republican forms of rule. King Faysal responded to this danger by mending fences with the northern Yemen Arab Republic and scheming to foment discord between it and the People's Republic of the south. Faysal's policy created a complex set of circumstances in which the northern republic accepted Saudi economic assistance and sometimes engaged in armed clashes with the People's Republic yet at other times pursued the goal of unifying the two Yemens. Although the north and south signed a unity agreement in 1979, their turbulent domestic politics prevented its implementation. Throughout the 1980s, the two Yemens viewed one another and Saudi Arabia with suspicion.

The radicalization of the Yemens and the outbreak of popular liberation movements elsewhere in the peninsula prompted King Faysal to increase the size and efficiency of Saudi Arabia's armed forces. The confrontation in Yemen revealed that the Saudi military was not a credible deterrent against Egyptian and Yemeni aggression and that it might not even be capable of putting down a determined internal uprising. The government therefore embarked on a vigorous expansion of the kingdom's military capability. The defense budget rose to over $2 billion in 1970 and grew steadily thereafter. During the 1970s, the Saudis allocated between 35 and 40 percent of their total annual revenues to defense and security expenditures. This percentage remained constant even as Saudi revenues soared, so that in the fiscal year 1975–1976, the kingdom allocated nearly $36 billion for defense and security. The government endeavored to acquire the most sophisticated military technology that could be purchased, giving special priority to the air force, regardless of whether the Saudi forces had the capability to operate and maintain it. This military spending spree most benefited the United States, which concluded several lucrative weapons system contracts with the Saudis in the 1970s and 1980s.

The royal family was aware that young military officers had led the coups that overthrew the kings of Egypt and Iraq. The regime therefore closely supervised the armed forces and appointed senior officers from among the Saudi family. Despite the vast sums devoted to the military, the kingdom was unable to build an armed force that could compare with that of Iraq or Iran, its two most powerful potential regional antagonists. In any crisis that depended on military might alone, the Saudi state was bound to be ineffective. The Iraqi invasion of Kuwait in 1990 and the Saudis' speedy request for direct US military assistance demonstrated this vulnerability.

The Oil Embargo of 1973 and Its Consequences

A review of the arrangements between the Saudis and foreign oil companies before 1973 sheds light on the extent to which the oil embargo and the oil price increases of 1973 changed the world economy and catapulted Saudi Arabia into global financial prominence. Ibn Sa‘ud granted the kingdom’s first oil concession in 1933 to the Standard Oil Company of California (later reorganized as the Arabian American Oil Company, ARAMCO). The company acquired the right to extract and transport petroleum found within its concession in exchange for the construction of a refinery and the payment of royalties amounting to four gold shillings per ton of crude oil. The terms of the concession were immensely favorable to ARAMCO. Oil was discovered in the eastern province of Dahran in 1938, but major commercial production did not take place until after World War II. During the 1950s, the concession agreements were modified so that Saudi Arabia and most other Middle Eastern oil producers received 50 percent of the profits from the foreign companies. However, the oil-producing countries had little say in determining prices or production levels. ARAMCO emerged as a giant multinational corporation that controlled not only the exploration and extraction of Saudi oil but also its refining, marketing, and pricing.

In an attempt to gain greater control over pricing policies, representatives from five of the major producing countries—Iran, Iraq, Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, and Venezuela—founded the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC) in 1960. The organization later expanded to include thirteen nations. A parallel group, the Organization of Arab Petroleum Exporting Countries (OAPEC), composed solely of Arab oil exporters, was created in 1968. The impulse behind the formation of the two organizations was a desire on the part of the member states to assert control of their most valuable natural resource. For the Middle Eastern states in particular, the issue was independence. OPEC was founded in the Nasser era, and one of Nasserism's principal goals was to break out of the constraints of postwar neocolonialism that found the Western powers still manipulating the Arab world's diplomatic and economic affairs. OPEC's immediate objective was to utilize its member states' collective-bargaining power to pressure the Western oil companies to increase oil prices. But as long as the world supply of oil was plentiful, OPEC had limited success in changing the oil companies' policies and attitudes.

Abundant, low-cost oil was the energy source that fueled the postwar recovery of Europe and Japan and assured the economic vigor of the United States. With the rise of gasoline-fueled automobiles and diesel-powered trains and the mounting use of oil to supply energy for industry, coal economies were transformed to depend on oil. This transformation was grounded in the assumption that oil would always be readily available and moderately priced. During the late 1960s and early 1970s, the assumption was borne out as the industrial states enjoyed rapid economic growth made possible by an ever-increasing supply of cheap oil. However, the industrial world's avid consumption of oil made it more dependent on Middle Eastern petroleum producers. As world demand for oil rose, the Middle East came to supply an ever-greater percentage of the demand. This was especially true for Japan and Western Europe, areas that either had no oil of their own or had oil that was extremely costly to extract (as in the case of the North Sea reserves). As a result of this reliance on low-cost petroleum, Saudi Arabia supplied 21.6 percent of Europe's oil requirements in 1972 and 13 percent of the world's total production of crude oil in 1973. Even the United States, a major producer and the world's largest petroleum consumer, became dependent on imported oil. Saudi Arabia's share of US oil imports in 1973 was 8.1 percent.¹

In these circumstances of growing US, European, and Japanese dependence on Middle Eastern petroleum, the industry gradually restructured. Led by demands from the shah of Iran, prices began to edge upward in the late 1960s, and some of the producing countries attained partial control over pricing and production levels. Despite these changes, the world was unprepared for the Arab producers' decision to deploy their oil weapon as an instrument of diplomacy. In the midst of the Arab-Israeli war of October 1973, the United States carried out an extensive airlift of military supplies to Israel, and US president Richard Nixon requested that Congress approve a $2.2 billion appropriation for military assistance to Israel. Saudi Arabia responded by joining OAPEC in embagoing all oil shipments to the United States and the Netherlands (the latter targeted primarily because of Rotterdam's importance as a port of entry and distribution center for oil destined for Europe). In addition, the Saudis and other Arab oil producers announced that they would cut back on oil production and reduce the amounts available to the consuming countries. These announcements sparked panic and confusion in the industrial states. A scramble to purchase non-Arab oil followed, and prices began to rise. In November 1973, the political leverage of the oil weapon became apparent as the European Economic Community and Japan issued statements affirming Palestinian rights and urging Israeli withdrawal from the territories occupied in 1967. In the following months, previously underpriced petroleum began to find its true market value. OPEC set the price at $11.65 per barrel effective January 1, 1974; a year earlier the price had been $2.74. The price increases had a dramatic impact on Saudi revenues. In the year before the price hikes, the kingdom earned $6.4 billion in oil revenues; in the fiscal year 1974–1975, Saudi revenues skyrocketed by 330 percent to $27.7 billion. During 1981, when oil prices peaked at $34 per barrel, Saudi Arabia's oil revenues were an astounding $102 billion. The kingdom was awash in funds.

The 1973 embargo set in motion other significant developments in the petroleum industry, most notably the heightened participation by OPEC countries in the ownership of oil-producing operations and their involvement in such downstream activities as refining, distributing, and marketing. However, the giant foreign oil companies did not disappear; they provided the technology and expertise on which the producers still depended, and their services were retained through lease-back arrangements and joint ventures with the local national oil companies. ARAMCO thus remained a potent factor in Saudi national life.

Rapid Development After 1973

As the major Arab oil producer and a world petroleum and financial power, Saudi Arabia's regional and international stature was transformed after 1973. The kingdom could no longer sidestep the Arab-Israeli issue and tried to maintain a balance between its desire not to alienate the United States, a major consumer of oil and supplier of military equipment, and its need to maintain common cause with the Palestinians and the regimes that supported them. The judicious distribution of oil wealth became a mighty force in Saudi diplomacy; Syria and the PLO received generous financial support from the Saudis in exchange for muting their criticism of the royal regime and its ties to the United States. Although the Saudi government preferred to buy off potential enemies rather than fight them, it viewed the Iranian revolution of 1979 as such a major threat that it embarked on another huge arms buildup. Indeed, the Saudis spent billions of its petrodollars to purchase sophisticated military equipment, to construct elaborate air-defense systems, and to expand the domestic security agencies as well as the regular army, navy, and air force. The United States again acted as the kingdom's major arms supplier.

In addition to devoting colossal sums to defense, King Faysal and his successors used the kingdom's abundant oil wealth to finance a massive economic and social development project. Members of the royal family tended to view the country's transformation as a single procedure, a kind of technical exercise that would instantly transform underdevelopment into modernity. They therefore believed that it could be undertaken without upsetting the conservative social structure and Islamic value system on which the regime's authority depended. This assumption overlooked the possible changes in attitude that might be generated by the importation of foreign workers and technology and the creation of an indigenous, university-educated middle class.²

The implementation of the new development plans had just begun when King Faysal was assassinated in 1975 by one of his nephews. His successor, Khalid (1975–1982), was an inexperienced administrator and often in poor health. He delegated much of his authority to Crown Prince Fahd, who assumed major responsibility for the kingdom's affairs and became king after Khalid's death. Faysal was the last of the Saudi monarchs to exercise full royal decision-making powers; his successors ruled through collective agreements reached among leading members of the royal family, a process that occasionally made it difficult to set clear policy directions.

But the tensions within the ruling family did not prevent Saudi Arabia from embarking on an unprecedented decade of development featuring expansion across the country's infrastructure, from transportation and communications to petroleum facilities, from the construction of architecturally stunning university campuses to the creation of desalinization plants and secondary industries. Material development and social change also brought pressures for political change.

One potential source for new ideas was represented by the masses of foreign workers the kingdom employed to offset its acute manpower shortage. Population statistics on the number of native Saudis are disputed, especially because the government routinely inflated them for planning and security purposes; estimates of the native Saudi population for 1980 range from 4.59 million to 11.5 million. Nadav Safran's investigation into the subject led him to favor the lower figures, and his own estimate for 1980 is 5 million.³ Imported labor was essential to carry out the infrastructure transformation the Saudi leadership envisaged. By 1980, there were 2.1 million foreign workers in the country with some 400,000 dependents. The most populous group, about 1 million, came from North Yemen. Egyptians and Palestinians from Jordan and the occupied territories numbered about 200,000 each, and there were over 50,000 Asians, mainly Filipinos and Pakistanis. Of the 100,000 Westerners residing in the country, about 40,000 were from the United States and 25,000 from Britain. The presence of such high numbers of foreigners—many of whom held values that differed from those on which the Saudi royal order rested and whose lifestyles were contrary to Islamic principles—led the regime to attempt to isolate its foreign residents. Westerners were concentrated mainly in the sprawling ARAMCO compound near the eastern oil fields. Saudi security agencies closely monitored other foreigners and deported them if they showed signs of troublesome activity.

Saudi Arabia's rapid modernization created a new indigenous middle-class elite of teachers, civil servants, private businessmen, and military officers. Despite this elite's education and its growing responsibility in managing the machinery of government, its members were excluded from participation in political life. The royal family retained tight control over decision making and refused to sanction political parties, labor unions, and other interest groups. In the early 1980s, King Fahd announced, as had Faysal and Khalid earlier, his intention of introducing a charter of rights and establishing a national consultative council. However, the king reneged on these promises. By refusing to share power or open up the political process, the royal family risked alienating the new middle class that was a product of the regime's program of rapid modernization. The regime hoped to survive by rewarding the new elite with well-paying positions and providing the population at large with generous social welfare services.

In some respects, the Saudi Arabia of the early 1980s appeared similar to Iran in the shah's final years. Both countries experienced extensive economic, educational, and military development without a corresponding change in politics. The emerging Western-educated elite were denied channels through which to express their aspirations and grievances. However, the ways in which the shah and the Saudi royal family related to their countries' official religious establishments contrasted sharply, and this difference helps explain the stability of the Saudi system through the 1980s.

Islam and the Saudi State

To the outside world, Saudi Arabia projected the image of a puritanical Islamic regime. Ibn Sa‘ud had consolidated his power by blending the strict creed of Wahhabi Islam with the fighting prowess of the Bedouin tribesmen. His successors' rule was legitimized by their defense of Islamic beliefs and values. The House of Sa‘ud was allowed to govern because it claimed to be bound by the Quran and the shari‘ah and committed to enforcing them. King Faysal, justifying his decision not to issue a charter of rights, stated that “Sa‘udi Arabia has no need for a constitution because it has the Quran, which is the oldest and most efficient constitution in the world.”⁴ By posing as the protector of Islam, the royal family justified its monopoly of power.

Even during the period of rapid social and economic change inaugurated by Faysal and continued by his successors, the royal family's association with Islam remained its principal legitimizing factor. This association was made possible by the existence of a mutually beneficial relationship between the monarchy and the religious establishment. The relationship was established by Ibn Sa‘ud, who eased the ulama out of policymaking authority and placed them on the state payroll. The ulama accepted their incorporation into the state bureaucracy and acknowledged the Saudis’ right to rule. In exchange, they were permitted to retain extensive influence over education, the legal system, and the supervision of public morality. In contrast to the situation in Nasser’s Egypt, the ulama in Saudi Arabia continued to have recognized authority in important spheres of public activity; and in contrast to the situation in the shah’s Iran, they were not independent of the state nor were they attacked by it. Their status was respected, and the Saudi kings made a point of seeking their approval for policies that might affect the Islamic standing of the royal family, but the ulama were not instrumental in the formulation of state policy as a whole.

The ulama accepted their exclusion from the realms of foreign policy and petroleum development because of the leverage they retained in their traditional spheres. They had the power to withhold approval of sensitive domestic policies and thus to call into question the Islamic legitimacy of such policies and of the ruling house that proposed them. This power, and the favorable concessions it could bring from the state, was evident during Faysal’s tenure as crown prince and king. Faysal introduced sweeping educational changes, but he allowed the ulama to set the moral tone of the system, agreeing to including courses in Islamic religion at all levels of instruction. In 1960, Faysal’s plan to introduce public education for females met with strong opposition from the religious establishment. Faysal insisted on the adoption of his policy, but he permitted the ulama to supervise the classroom arrangements and appointed members of the religious establishment to pivotal positions in the Ministry of Education. The modernization of the Saudi educational program was carefully designed to cater to ulama preferences on curriculum content, the separation of sexes in the classrooms even in the “secular” universities, and the provision of mosque facilities on the new campuses. Another example of the concessions the ulama could wrest from the royal family arose from Faysal’s proposal to bring television to the kingdom in 1963. Although the religious establishment objected to this innovation, Faysal introduced it anyway. But as a compromise he permitted the ulama to monitor the programming.

The ulama also retained a central role in supervising public behavior. They controlled the Morality Police, an organization that assumed increasing power after King Faysal's death. Originally responsible for ensuring the observance of such Islamic practices as the closure of shops during prayer hours and the wearing of proper attire by women, the Morality Police gained authority in the early 1980s to monitor the activities of resident foreigners and to propagate Islamic doctrines among the rural population. The religious establishment also took charge of the annual pilgrimage, a ritual that emphasized the kingdom's Islamic character. Thus, the royal family determined overall policy but granted the ulama sufficient authority to satisfy their demands and to guarantee their support for the House of Sa‘ud as legitimate Islamic rulers.

Although the regime endeavored to project an image of piety, individual princes' behavior tarnished the royal family's reputation and made a mockery of its claims to conform to the standards of Islamic behavior. As the family grew and became more diverse—there were approximately 5,000 royal princes by the early 1980s—it lost the single-minded sense of purpose that had been its strength, and it proved unable or unwilling to control all of its members' activities. The gap between the image of public morality and the reality of private behavior led the regime's opponents to accuse it of hypocrisy.

The most vivid example of religiously based discontent within the kingdom was the seizure of the Grand Mosque of Mecca in 1979. Juhayman al-Utaybi, a former National Guard officer, led the takeover. Inspired by Wahhabi doctrine and disillusioned over what he saw as the corruption and materialism of the Saudi rulers, Juhayman attracted a following among youths who had been marginalized by modernization. During the pilgrimage in November 1979, Juhayman and a few hundred well-armed supporters occupied the Grand Mosque in Mecca and used the mosque's public address system to broadcast accusations of corruption against the government and the ulama. After two weeks, the government obtained a decree from the ulama authorizing armed force to break the siege. Dislodging the determined occupiers without destroying Islam's holiest shrine proved difficult and cost many lives on both sides. Juhayman finally surrendered, and he and his surviving followers were executed. His movement received no overt support within the country, but it alarmed the Saudi authorities because it represented a failure of their domestic intelligence services and damaged the regime's reputation.

The Mecca incident revealed the vulnerability of the royal family to charges of impiety. The accusations of corruption Juhayman's followers aired during the siege did not go unnoticed. Some of the wealthy princes' scandalous and offensive behavior threatened to make the royal family appear unfaithful to the Islamic standards it used to legitimize its right to rule. If the family could not live up to the Islamic principles it professed to defend, then it might be deemed unworthy of the ulama's support, and the withdrawal of the religious establishment's backing might embolden the new middle classes to demand a voice in the kingdom's decision-making councils.

KUWAIT, OMAN, AND THE SMALLER GULF STATES

At the head of the Persian Gulf, tucked between Saudi Arabia and Iraq, lies Kuwait, one of the world's wealthiest nations during the 1970s and 1980s. The southern end of the Gulf is dominated by Oman, a large, geographically diverse country also rich in petroleum resources. In between these two states are several small desert principalities—Bahrain, Qatar, and the seven members of the United Arab Emirates (UAE). Beneath the sands and seas of Saudi Arabia and these eleven Gulf states lie 50 percent of the world's proven reserves of oil. Because of their petroleum resources, the states of the Gulf have been transformed from local subsistence economies with marginal diplomatic status into enormously wealthy states with substantial international influence. Their affluence has helped to strengthen their ruling families' political authority. In an age that has largely abandoned the concept of government directed by hereditary royal families, the Gulf states are exceptions.

Most of the family dynasties that rule the Gulf states were established in the mid-eighteenth century. A combination of British imperialism, oil concession agreements, and the vast revenues that began in the post–World War II era facilitated their survival and their acquisition of power. During the nineteenth century, Britain sought to protect the route to India by keeping European powers and the Ottomans out of the Gulf. It accomplished this objective through a series of treaties binding the region's states to agree that they would not enter into diplomatic relations with other powers without Britain's consent. In return, Britain pledged to protect the Gulf states from external aggression. Most of these treaties remained in effect, with modifications, until 1971 and secured Britain's predominance in the Gulf. At the time the agreements were concluded, the Gulf rulers were scarcely more than tribal chieftains whom local tribal leaders and merchants had empowered to negotiate with foreign powers on their behalf. However, Britain's policy of treating these rulers as heads of state—even if subservient ones—institutionalized their authority and gave them a recognized ruling identity. As signatories to the treaties, the rulers were expected to enforce the agreements and to assume the responsibilities imposed upon them.

The arrival in the 1930s of Western oil companies seeking concessions further consolidated the ruling families' authority. In each state it was the reigning prince who negotiated directly with the companies and signed the concessions. When commercial oil production began after 1945, the prince and his family reaped the benefits; his name—or his father's or uncle's or brother's—was on the concession agreement. The signatory represented the state, and when the oil wealth poured in, there was no distinction between the state and the ruler. Although there were certain variations to this historical pattern, most Gulf states took such a course.

Kuwait: Petroleum Giant

Kuwait was settled in the early eighteenth century by tribes migrating from Arabia's Najd region. By 1756, Kuwait had become an autonomous principality headed by the al-Sabah family, whose rule has continued into the present century. Like most Gulf states, Kuwait looked to the sea, and its economy was based on commerce, shipbuilding, and, above all, pearling. Kuwait City was the Gulf's best harbor, and merchants developed it as a center for trade between India and parts of the Middle East. These enterprises brought wealth to the Kuwaiti merchant community, which then subsidized the al-Sabah ruling family. Before the inflow of oil revenues, the rulers had little income of their own. They depended on the merchants to maintain them, and in exchange, the merchants gained a voice in decision making.

The Ottoman sultans acknowledged the autonomy of the al-Sabah rulers but nevertheless claimed sovereignty over the territory of Kuwait, regarding it as the southernmost administrative unit of the province of Basra. As with many of their distant and loosely held lands, the Ottomans did not directly enforce their claim to Kuwait and relied on the al-Sabah rulers to maintain order in their portion of the Gulf. This arrangement prevailed until the nineteenth century and the arrival of the British, with their policy of extracting treaties of protection from the Gulf rulers. In 1897, in a move designed to prevent Kuwait from falling within the British sphere of influence, Sultan Abdul Hamid II appointed its ruler, Mubarak I, to the post of district administrator. The appointment implied Mubarak's subordination to the Ottoman governor of Basra, a status he resisted by appealing to the British for assistance against the Ottoman attempts at control.

Britain responded with a show of naval force, a provocation the Ottomans met with angry protests. Mubarak I then signed a treaty with the British (1899) in which he pledged not to enter into negotiations with other states before obtaining British approval. On the eve of World War I, the British became concerned over German ambitions in the territory stretching from Baghdad to the Gulf and decided an agreement with the Ottomans to secure future interests in that region was more important than exclusive control of Kuwait. In the Anglo-Ottoman Convention of 1913, Britain relinquished its hold on Kuwait in exchange for the right to participate in railroad development south of Baghdad and for an Ottoman pledge to withdraw from certain territories on the Gulf's western shore. The convention recognized Kuwait as an autonomous Ottoman administrative district and referred to the al-Sabah ruler as an Ottoman district supervisor.

Ottoman suzerainty over Kuwait was short-lived. When the Ottomans allied with Germany in World War I, Britain considered the 1913 convention to be invalidated and proclaimed Kuwait an independent principality under British protection. It remained so until independence in 1961. At the end of the war, the British drew the frontiers separating Kuwait from the new mandate state of Iraq, unwittingly laying the groundwork for future controversies.

During the 1920s and 1930s, a wrenching economic decline turned Kuwait into one of the world's most impoverished countries. The pearl industry was undercut by the worldwide depression and then virtually destroyed by the introduction of the cultured pearl. The arrival of the international oil companies checked Kuwait's plunge into poverty. In 1934, the ruler, Ahmad al-Jabir al-Sabah (1921–1950), signed an agreement with Gulf Oil and British Petroleum authorizing them to become equal owners in a concession known as the Kuwait Oil Company. Within four years, the exploration teams discovered one of the largest pools of oil in the world. Commercial oil exports began in 1946, generating an income in that year of $760,000. By 1953, oil revenues shot up to $169 million, and after the price increases of 1973, they reached an astounding $21.7 billion in 1980. Petroleum income turned the former backwater pearl state of less than 1 million native inhabitants into a major financial power.

Kuwait has undergone immense changes in the oil age. Four of them deserve special attention: a reversal in the financial and political relationship between the amir (the title of the ruler after independence in 1961) and the merchant community; the creation of a welfare state; the reliance on imported labor; and Kuwait's assumption of a new role as a player in Middle Eastern diplomacy and a focus of concern for the Western industrial powers.

Kuwait was fortunate in having Amir Abdallah al-Salim al-Sabah (1950–1965) to guide it through the first phase of change generated by oil wealth. A cautious and frugal ruler, Abdallah negotiated independence from Britain in 1961 and blunted the lure of Nasserism by creating a national assembly in 1962. Moreover, he understood that Kuwaiti oil revenues would better serve future generations by being invested rather than squandered on the ruling family. Abdallah's major political challenge was to resolve the changing pattern of relationships between the al-Sabah ruling family and the merchants who had previously been its financial patrons. As the ruling family's spectacular wealth freed it from financial dependence on the merchant community, the family tended to exclude the merchants from its decision-making councils. In the face of merchant protests over their declining political status, Amir Abdallah reached an agreement with them:

He pledged to guarantee the leading merchant families a substantial share of the oil wealth that accrued to him as ruler. In exchange, the merchants renounced their claims to political power, withdrawing from political life in order to preserve their financial well-being.

Amir Abdallah sought to provide a limited forum for political discussion by creating an elected national assembly, which first convened in 1963. During the years of the assembly's existence (it was dissolved from 1976 to 1981 and again from 1986 to 1992), it was the only such body in the Gulf and exemplified Kuwait's unique political life. Although the franchise was severely restricted—only adult Kuwaiti males whose ancestors resided in the country before 1920 could vote—and the size of the assembly was limited to fifty deputies, the very presence of the body gave Kuwait a special character. The regime's tolerance of a moderate opposition in the national assembly and of a relatively free press and publishing industry made Kuwait the most intellectually vibrant and politically diverse Gulf state in the 1960s and 1970s.

However, the existence of a national assembly did not restrict the ruling family's political authority. Although the institutions of constitutional democracy were in place, genuine power was reserved for the amir and his relatives. Members of the al-Sabah family held key government posts ranging from the prime ministership to the most sensitive cabinet positions, and state policy was determined in family councils, not through debate in the national assembly. Insofar as Kuwaitis participated in government, they did so through their positions in the civil service. Kuwait, like Saudi Arabia, rewarded its educated citizens with appointments to the bureaucracy and access to the generous benefits associated with such posts. The practice created overstaffing and inefficiency, but it also blunted political dissent by making officeholders part of the system.

The fragility of Kuwaiti democratic institutions came to light during the ministerial crises of 1985 and 1986. In 1985, the national assembly exposed corruption on the part of the al-Sabah minister of justice and another al-Sabah cabinet minister and pressured the men to resign. But the ruling family would not tolerate such challenges to its authority, and in 1986, the amir dissolved the national assembly and imposed press censorship. Promises to reconvene the assembly were not implemented until late 1992. The abrupt termination of Kuwait's experiment in limited representation demonstrated the al-Sabah family's ability to reinstitute royal autocracy whenever it saw fit.

The second characteristic of Kuwait in the oil era was its ability to provide its citizens with a cradle-to-grave welfare system unequaled elsewhere in the world. Amir Abdallah and his successors, Amir Sabah al-Salim al-Sabah (1965–1977) and Amir Jaber Ahmad al-Sabah (1977–2006), distributed their oil wealth as a form of royal largesse. Their policies brought Kuwaiti citizens free education, health care, transportation, and housing. Donors and recipients alike regarded these privileges as grants from the ruling family to its subjects. Kuwaiti citizens paid no taxes; they were part of a special society that received welfare benefits without contributing to them. As in Saudi Arabia, the ruling family gave education a high priority in its welfare expenditures and showered huge sums into developing an advanced educational system. Kuwait University, founded in 1966, enrolled about 10,000 students in the late 1980s, half of them women. Yet the Kuwaiti constitution denied women the right to vote, a restriction that highlighted the discrepancy between social development and political participation that was evident in Saudi Arabia and Iran as well as other Gulf states.

Also like Saudi Arabia and most other Gulf states, Kuwait depended on a foreign work force to develop its petroleum industry and supporting infrastructure. By 1965, foreign residents outnumbered Kuwaitis, and by the mid-1980s, foreigners made up an estimated 60 percent of the country's total population of 1.5 million. The foreign domination of the Kuwaiti work force ranged across the spectrum from managers and professionals to blue-collar workers and menial laborers. Palestinians from the West Bank and Jordan constituted the largest group of non-Kuwaitis, numbering between 300,000 and 400,000 in the mid-1980s. The government did not extend to the foreign workers the same benefits it granted Kuwaitis: Foreigners were denied the right to own land or homes and were subject to deportation without notice. The discrepancy between the privileged Kuwaitis and the expatriate workers was a source of tension in the country, especially during regional crises.

Kuwait's reliance on the external world for its development and prosperity extended beyond the work force. The country depended on the West and Japan as markets for its oil, as sources for the technology and equipment that extracted the oil, and as suppliers of the expertise that planned, built, and operated its airports, university campuses, hospitals, and communications systems. Moreover, Kuwait's continued prosperity rested to a large extent upon other countries' stock markets and real estate values. Because Kuwait could not spend the vast revenues it accumulated after the price hikes of 1973, the government embarked on a program of overseas investment. The program was so successful that, by the mid-1980s, Kuwait's income from investments exceeded its revenue from oil exports. The country's mix of investment income and oil revenue earned it the name "Kuwait Incorporated," a label that was not intended as a compliment.

The fourth characteristic of Kuwait in the oil age had several dimensions. To the world's industrial powers, Kuwait was a stable monarchy with mammoth oil reserves and far-flung overseas investments, all of which deserved protection; to its immediate powerful neighbors—Saudi Arabia, Iraq, and Iran—it was a state to be courted and possibly annexed; and to other states of the region, it was a potential source of largesse and an object of criticism. Kuwait's amirs tried to balance these challenges and opportunities. On the one hand, they maintained cordial relations with the states that purchased their country's petroleum. On the other hand, they sought to preserve Kuwait's independence and their own rule by providing generous foreign aid to potential regional enemies. The government was sensitive to the presence of nearly 400,000 Palestinians in Kuwait and gave extensive financial assistance to the PLO and the Arab states bordering Israel. During the Iran-Iraq War, Kuwait provided Arab Iraq with billions of dollars' worth of direct and indirect economic assistance. However, as demonstrated by the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait in 1990, the use of oil revenues as an instrument of diplomacy was no substitute for a credible military force, and a military was one institution Kuwait's money could not create.

Oman

Oman commands a strategic position at the juncture of the Gulf of Oman and the Arabian Sea. Its Persian Gulf territory includes the Musandam Peninsula, the finger of land that juts into the Strait of Hormuz. Tankers transport most of the Gulf's oil through this narrow strait. Oman differs in several ways from the other Gulf states. It is a large and geographically diverse country with an agricultural base lacking in the desert principalities. Although the other Gulf states have a Sunni Muslim majority, most Omanis belong to the Ibadi sect of Islam.

At the end of the nineteenth century, Oman's rulers lost control of the interior of the country and were reduced to accepting loans from the British government to maintain their power on the coast. Although Oman did not surrender its independence to Britain, the sultans signed several treaties with British representatives and relied heavily on British advice and assistance. For the first sixty years of the twentieth century, Oman was an isolated, impoverished, and inward-looking country. During the long reign of Sultan Sa'id ibn Taymur (1932–1970), the British assisted the royal forces in regaining control over the tribal interior. Once his country was reunited, Sultan Sa'id left the capital of Muscat and settled in a distant coastal town in Dhofar province. Ruling in a despotic, anachronistic manner, he lived as a virtual recluse, and his country became as isolated as he was. Even after oil exports began in 1964, Sultan Sa'id refused to change his habits or his conservative policies. Toward the end of his reign, there were only three schools in the country and 6 miles (9.6 kilometers) of paved roads.

In 1970, the sultan was overthrown in a palace coup led by his son Qabus, who then assumed the office of sultan. Domestically, an expanding rebellion in the province of Dhofar loomed large for the new ruler. The rebellion had begun in 1964 as a popular protest against Sa'id's autocratic and neglectful rule, but in the late 1960s, Marxist groups took over the leadership and expanded the movement's scope to embrace antimonarchical, anti-imperial goals. The Dhofar rebellion became a rallying point for republican forces throughout the Arabian Peninsula. China and the Soviet Union extended assistance to the rebels, and South Yemen offered sanctuary to those who fled the sultan's forces. Sultan Qabus received help from his fellow monarchs, the shah of Iran and the king of Jordan, both of whom sent contingents of troops to contain the spread of republicanism. In an attempt to win the loyalty of Dhofar's population, Qabus directed large sums of development funds to projects in the province. His policy of reconciliation defused the rebellion, and a combined Iranian and Omani offensive defeated the rebel forces and reestablished the sultan's rule in 1976.

Sultan Qabus was educated in England and was determined to transform his nation. Although Oman's oil revenues—$1.7 billion in 1978—lagged behind Kuwait's, they were sufficient to fund an extensive government program of infrastructure development. Schools and highways were quickly constructed, and the capital city, Muscat, underwent a rapid change in appearance. Within a decade of coming to power, Qabus succeeded in raising the standard of living of the population as a whole and garnering wide support. However, with almost no trained personnel of its own, Oman, like Kuwait, was forced to employ large numbers of foreign workers and managers to carry out its modernization program. Like Kuwait, Oman had to rely on foreign expertise and labor for its continued development.

Sultan Qabus endeavored to implement an ambitious program of material change while retaining all the traditional powers of the sultan. Although the government machinery became more complex after 1970, Qabus continued to rule as an absolute monarch. Oman had neither a constitution nor a legislature; all power was concentrated in the person of the sultan.

The Smaller States of the Gulf

Nine political entities are squeezed along the shore of the Persian Gulf between Oman and the island nation of Bahrain. All were under British tutelage from the nineteenth century until their independence in 1971. Seven of the states—Abu Dhabi, Dubai, Sharja, Ajman, Umm al-Qaiwain, Fujairah, and Ras al-Khaimah—became part of a federated state, the United Arab Emirates, in 1971, whereas Bahrain and Qatar chose to remain distinct, independent nations.

Britain's announcement in 1968 that it would withdraw from all its bases east of Suez within three years caused alarm rather than enthusiasm among the rulers of the small Gulf principalities. Britain may have been a restrictive patron, but it was also a protective one. As long as Britain maintained treaty relations with the rulers, their domestic status was secure and their territorial integrity assured. However, once the British intention to withdraw protection became known, Iran and Saudi Arabia sought to expand their influence over their weaker neighbors. Iran claimed sovereignty over Bahrain, and the shah's military occupied three small islands in the Strait of Hormuz in 1971. The withdrawal of the Western imperial power threatened to open the door for regional powers to make imperial claims of their own.

Between 1968 and 1971, British representatives presided over intensive, often difficult negotiations that resolved the most pressing issues and preserved the separate identity of the Gulf states. In a referendum conducted by the United Nations, the population of Bahrain voted for independence rather than absorption into Iran. The shah agreed to drop his territorial claims on condition that Bahrain not join any union or federation. Qatar, a small but enormously wealthy oil state, also chose independence; the seven former trucial states were brought together in the UAE federation. Bahrain, Qatar, and the UAE secured formal independence in 1971.

Although distinctive in their cultural, governmental, and religious identities, the three political units generally followed the development pattern that prevailed in Kuwait. Each state, including the seven members of the UAE, was headed by a ruling family that concentrated political power in the hands of the amir and his relatives. During the booming 1970s, all three states went on spending sprees that transformed their material and social foundations yet left their traditional political institutions intact. As their petroleum wealth thrust them into regional prominence, they had to deal with the impact of regional tensions on their newly aware populations. These included popular attitudes toward the Arab-Israeli conflict as well as toward such crucial issues as political representation within a monarchical system and religious versus national identity. Qatar, with a majority of its population professing the Wahhabi version of Islam, was drawn to Saudi Arabia as a regional patron; Bahrain, 70 percent of whose population was Shi'a, also turned to Saudi Arabia for protection against revolutionary Iran, which resurrected claims to Bahrain and called upon its Shi'a population to overthrow the Sunni ruler.

Bahrain, which started to export oil in 1934, was the first Arab Gulf state to develop a petroleum-based economy. At a time when its neighbors were suffering from the collapse of the pearl industry, Bahrain was amassing oil revenues that it used to train an indigenous labor force, establish a public education system, and sponsor the region's first Arabic-language newspaper. Although Bahrain's oil revenues in the 1970s were less than those of Qatar or the UAE, its head start in development made it a more politically and socially complex state. It had a comparatively moderate reliance on imported labor: Approximately 30 percent of Bahrain's total population in the mid-1980s was foreign; by contrast, Qatar and the UAE relied so heavily on foreign labor and management that approximately 80 percent of the total population of each state consisted of resident aliens. Within the UAE, a substantial imbalance prevailed among the federated states. Abu Dhabi, by far the largest, wealthiest member of the federation, was an important world petroleum power in the 1970s, and its amir served as UAE president. Two other oil-exporting states, Dubai and to a lesser extent Sharja, also played key roles in UAE governance. In 1984, a fourth member of the UAE, Ras al-Khaimah, began to export oil. The federation's other states had meager subsistence economies that were subsidized by revenue-sharing agreements with the oil-producing members. Buoyed by the sudden and substantial revenues that flooded in after 1973, the entire federation went on a ten-year spending spree that made it the focus of attention for a broad spectrum of development operations. Yet despite the tremendous changes and challenges generated by oil wealth, the seven UAE states as well as Qatar and Bahrain remained under the political control of nine traditional ruling families.

CONCLUSION

The oil embargo of 1973 marked a momentous event for the states of the Arabian Peninsula and the world economy. Arab oil producers discovered that their petroleum could be used as a diplomatic weapon in the Arab-Israeli conflict, and oil consumers suddenly recognized their growing thirst for Middle Eastern oil. By withholding their oil from the market, the producing states were given an opportunity to discover the true value of their most precious resource. During the final months of 1973, consuming countries were willing to pay several times the set price for non-Arab oil. When the Arab producers reentered the marketplace in January 1974, they joined with their OPEC partners to set the price of a barrel of oil at $11.65, a stunning increase from the $2.74 price of a year earlier. Until 1982, the price of oil rose steadily, bringing enormous wealth and enhanced status to the producing states.

Oil revenues powered an unprecedented development boom among the Arabian Peninsula states. Yet amid the glittering material improvements and disruptive social changes, political power remained in the hands of hereditary dynasties. The dominant ruling families attempted to preserve their authority by preventing the emergence of representative assemblies and mass politics. They muted discontent through the skillful distribution of oil income, providing well-paying jobs for the educated elite and generous welfare benefits for the population as a whole. This technique created remarkable political stability and ensured the ruling families' survival. It did not, however, resolve problems—it merely postponed them.

CHAPTER 21

THE CONSOLIDATION OF AUTHORITARIAN RULE IN SYRIA AND IRAQ

The Regimes of Hafiz al-Asad and Saddam Husayn

The Arab defeat at the hands of Israel in the June War prompted a period of soul-searching throughout the Arab world and led, in the cases of Syria and Iraq, to the overthrow of the existing regimes. Prior to 1967, these two states had acquired well-deserved reputations for political instability, but in the post-1967 order, they developed remarkably durable regimes. In Syria, Hafiz al-Asad seized power in 1970 and retained the presidency until his death in 2000; in Iraq, Saddam Husayn emerged as the political strongman in 1968, was officially proclaimed president in 1979, and retained power even after his country's defeat in the Gulf War of 1991 and despite its struggles under an economic embargo that remained in effect up to the US invasion of 2003. Each of these men distrusted the other, and in the 1970s, their two countries became locked in a smoldering rivalry for regional dominance. Yet despite their foreign policy clashes, their regimes had much in common.

In al-Asad and Husayn, both states had rulers whose persons and regimes represented the rise of a new elite of rural origins at the expense of the established urban politicians and merchants. Both regimes were authoritarian, basing their power on the military and the Ba'th Party. In both, the sole ruler held absolute power and became the object of a personality cult. Both regimes adopted socialist economic policies and stood for egalitarian reform. However, in the area of national wealth, they contrasted sharply. Although Syria became a net exporter of oil during the al-Asad era, its petroleum revenues paled in comparison with Iraq's. In 1979, Iraq's oil production was second only to Saudi Arabia's among all the oil-producing states of the Persian Gulf.

Hafiz al-Asad, Saddam Husayn, and their comrades in both countries expressed common sentiments of resentment toward the United States for its failure to understand the Arab predicament and for its unwavering support of Israel. Both regimes heaped enormous sums on military equipment in the 1970s and 1980s to buttress their claims to regional superiority and to confront their principal regional enemies—Israel in the case of Syria, Iran in the case of Iraq. Their expanded military capabilities might have augmented their diplomatic leverage, but it also prompted Iraq to embark on ill-conceived military ventures.

To focus on the careers of al-Asad and Husayn is not to suggest that it is individual leaders alone who shape the social and political dynamics of a state; however, these two rulers achieved great dominance in their countries' decision-making councils, and they retained that dominance over an impressively long period. Knowledge of the forces that shaped them and their policies is thus crucial to understanding the history of the region.

SYRIA IN THE AL-ASAD ERA

Hafiz al-Asad: The Rise to Power

Al-Asad was born in 1930 in the impoverished and isolated Alawite region of northwestern Syria. The Alawites were a Shi'a sect whose beliefs and rituals diverged so much from mainstream Islam that members of the Sunni establishment occasionally referred to them as infidels. Composing about 10 percent of the Syrian population, the Alawites possessed long-standing traditions of autonomy and alienation from the rest of Syrian society. Al-Asad was determined to break out of the isolation and poverty that characterized his community. He managed to gain admittance to the secondary school in Latakia, the first member of his family to advance past a primary education, and he consistently finished at the top of his class. Like other young men of his generation, al-Asad was attracted by the Ba‘th Party’s doctrine of national revival and social reform. At age sixteen, he joined the party and became an active student politician and Ba‘thist organizer.

Upon graduation from secondary school, he faced a problem common to many young Syrians of rural origins: He had talent and ambition, but his family was too poor to finance a university education. In al-Asad’s case, as for a number of his Alawite comrades, the military academy, with its free tuition, offered an opportunity to acquire postsecondary training and a state job as an officer in the armed forces. Al-Asad enrolled in the academy in 1951 and was assigned to the fledgling air force division. By all accounts, he was a top student and was selected for advanced fighter pilot training in the Soviet Union. By the late 1950s, he had made the breakthrough from Alawite peasant to skilled pilot and commissioned junior officer. But in the highly politicized Syrian armed forces of the era, the officer corps engaged in affairs of state as well as military duties. Thus al-Asad combined his role as officer and pilot with organizational activities on behalf of the Ba‘th Party.

For men of al-Asad’s political outlook, the period of the United Arab Republic (1958–1961) was difficult (see Chapter 15). He admired Nasser and supported the notion of Arab unity. However, he was dismayed over Egypt’s domination of the union and was especially upset at Nasser’s insistence that the Syrian Ba‘th Party be dissolved. His perspective did not improve when he was assigned to a meaningless post in Cairo, presumably because the Egyptian authorities regarded him as a potential troublemaker. During al-Asad’s time there, he became involved with like-minded young Syrian officers in a clandestine organization plotting a Ba‘th Party revival in their homeland. Their opportunity came during the political chaos that followed Syria’s secession from the UAR in 1961.

In 1963, al-Asad and his fellow officers carried out a coup d’état that brought the Ba‘th back into power. It also brought to power a tightly knit group of young Alawite officers who worked to consolidate their control over Syrian political life. In addition to al-Asad, who, at age thirty-three, became the commander of the air force, the ruling coterie was composed of Muhammad Umran and Salih Jadid, both from peasant backgrounds similar to al-Asad's. Although the head of state, Amin al-Hafiz, was a Sunni Muslim, the three young Alawites controlled the levers of power. Their domestic policies were designed to consolidate Ba'thist rule and to remake Syrian society along more equitable lines.

The social reforms undertaken by the new Ba'th regime continued the political and economic campaign against the urban notables. In 1965, the regime nationalized 100 companies and began to expropriate and redistribute land from the large privately owned estates. The following year all members of the old influential families were purged from government service. The new military regime was restructuring the Syrian political elite by forging an alliance between individuals of rural origins and the lower middle-class urbanites—schoolteachers, civil servants, and university students—who formed the Ba'th's backbone.

Al-Asad's faction of young officers led a violent internal coup that ousted Amin al-Hafiz in 1966 and rid the regime of many of the Ba'th's original supporters, including its cofounders, Aflaq and al-Bitar, both of whom fled their homeland, never to return. Although the regime that emerged out of the coup was ostensibly governed by civilians, it was in reality controlled by the military officers who had engineered the putsch. Al-Asad, now minister of defense as well as commander of the air force, became the dominant figure within the armed forces; his fellow Alawite Jadid controlled the Ba'th Party. The June War, in which Israel destroyed the Syrian air force and captured Syrian territory, discredited the regime and especially its minister of defense. However, al-Asad was convinced that Syria's defeat was caused primarily by his associates' mistakes, and he resolved to gain control over all aspects of Syrian decision making. In November 1970, al-Asad achieved his goal by ordering the arrest of Jadid and other members of the government. Early in the following year, al-Asad was elected to a seven-year term as president. The ambitious Alawite of peasant origins had risen to the pinnacle of Syrian power—what would he do with that power?

Instruments of Rule

Most scholarly studies of al-Asad portray him as cautious, calculating, and pragmatic. His pragmatism was evident in the moderate way he applied Ba‘thist principles and in the attempts he made to broaden his base of popular support. Although al-Asad’s government pursued the socialist policies enshrined in Ba‘thist doctrine, it was more tolerant of private enterprise than were the radical military regimes of the 1960s.

In another pragmatic gesture designed to gain support for his regime, al-Asad set up institutions of political participation that were more open and more broadly based than any Syria had known in over a decade. In 1973, the government introduced a new constitution that provided for an elected assembly known as the People’s Council. Yet the constitution granted the president such sweeping powers that the assembly was little more than a symbol of democratic government. Most controversially, the constitution omitted the usual clause requiring the president of the republic to be a Muslim. To the battered Sunni majority within Syria, this omission suggested that the regime of the Alawite ruler was both secular and sectarian, and they organized protest demonstrations in the major cities. Al-Asad quickly backed down from this confrontation and arranged for the insertion of a clause calling for a Muslim president. He also arranged for a prominent member of the Shi‘a ulama to issue a decree affirming that the Alawites were Muslims. The protest and al-Asad’s response showed the persistence of sectarian tensions in Syrian political life.

Al-Asad was calculating as well as pragmatic, and primary among his calculations was a determination to retain the power he had labored to acquire. Al-Asad had used the military and the Ba‘th Party as the vehicles for his ascent to the presidency, and once in power, he established them as the foundations of his regime. He himself took the office of secretary general of the Ba‘th, thus combining the two roles of head of state and head of the party. With its elaborate hierarchy, its network of affiliated popular organizations, and its branches in the armed forces, the Ba‘th developed into an instrument of political control and indoctrination. The other pillars of the regime, the military and the internal security forces, enforced the state’s authority and, when necessary, stamped out opposition.

Al-Asad attempted to ensure loyalty to his regime by appointing relatives and trusted associates to key positions in the ruling hierarchy. In this regard, al-Asad’s personal triumph in attaining the presidency was also a victory for the Alawite community. Alawite officers rose to the most prominent commands in the military and security agencies, thus gaining a stake in the regime's preservation. In addition, members of al-Asad's family were placed in charge of special forces outside the regular military structure. The most notable of these was an elite praetorian guard, known as the Defense Companies, commanded by the president's younger brother Rif'at. The regime took on a distinctly Alawite coloring that made it suspect in the eyes of the Sunni majority.

The Sunni Muslims who managed to gain appointments in the new power structure tended to hail from modest social backgrounds rather than from the old urban notability. Thus, in addition to its Alawite coloring, the regime had a decidedly rural composition and represented the rise of the countryside at the expense of the former elite class of urban-based notable families. The new elite of al-Asad's state also differed from the reformers who had built the Ba'th Party in the 1940s and 1950s. Aflaq and al-Bitar, the party founders, were of Damascene origin and developed their ideas while studying European literature and philosophy in Paris. To some extent, they represented a continuation of the nineteenth-century practice of seeking advanced education in the West. But the officials of al-Asad's regime came from rural hamlets and small towns; their educations took place in rudimentary village secondary schools and the national military academy. They were not inspired by the abstract ideas of European philosophers and, in most cases, not influenced by any sustained experiences in Western Europe.¹ Like the Free Officers of Egypt, they were pragmatic officers and administrators who focused on the needs of their country in its Middle Eastern context and on the retention of their own power.

Domestic Policy: Economy and Society

When al-Asad seized power in 1970, Syria's economy was predominantly agrarian based, and the country's leading cash export was cotton. During the first decade of al-Asad's rule, the economy shifted to one dominated by the service, industrial, and commercial sectors, and oil replaced cotton as the main source of foreign exchange.

The Ba‘thist regimes of the 1960s had reoriented Syria’s existing private enterprise economy to an economy based on state control. This shift was achieved through the nationalization of major business firms, banks, industrial plants, and transportation companies. In addition, the large landed estates were expropriated and a hesitant program of land redistribution was begun. President al-Asad retained the principle of public-sector domination of the economy, but he was less doctrinaire than his predecessors. He made gestures of reconciliation to the Sunni urban business people and merchants by liberalizing the economy and relaxing certain restrictions on private-sector activity.

The combination of public-sector dominance and private-sector participation was successful for a time, and Syria experienced an economic boom in the 1970s. Financial aid from the Arab oil-producing states, foreign loans from other countries, and increased revenues from Syria’s own modest petroleum industry allowed the government to embark on major development projects and to expand state services. However, Syria’s economic prosperity was tied to the Middle Eastern political situation, and when al-Asad’s foreign policies alienated the oil-rich states, the country’s economy plummeted and the government introduced urgent austerity measures.

Syria’s economic development suffered from internal problems as well. The supply of trained managers and technicians was inadequate to staff the rapidly expanding state-run enterprises. In addition, top managerial posts were often awarded on the basis of loyalty to the Ba‘th Party rather than on merit, a practice that led to inefficiency. Finally, the regime’s economic development became enmeshed in a web of corruption. Although al-Asad lived modestly, some of the high-ranking officials who rode into power on his coattails did not. The luxurious consumption in which certain military officers, government officials, and party functionaries engaged was financed by kickbacks, profiteering, and dealings on the black market. One of the most notorious practitioners of these activities was the president’s brother Rif‘at, whose expensive tastes and shady financial dealings were widely known. The corruption associated with such public figures contributed to popular disenchantment with the regime as a whole.

Possibly because of his own rural origins, al-Asad prioritized improving the living conditions of the peasantry. His government extended educational and medical services in the countryside, developed transportation and irrigation systems, and introduced peasant cooperatives to provide seed, machinery, and credit to the cultivators. Although these measures improved the conditions of rural life, the regime's efforts to manage agricultural production did not succeed. Land distribution schemes were set in place, but the majority of Syria's peasants remained landless. Moreover, the introduction of central planning led to the bureaucratization of agricultural decision making, creating situations in which Ba'th Party functionaries with little understanding of agriculture were empowered to impose decisions on patterns of crop rotation, marketing, and the like. Cotton production increased significantly in the 1970s and 1980s, whereas the cultivation of food crops did not keep pace with consumer needs. Syria was forced to import ever-greater amounts of food.

When al-Asad assumed power, the country's illiteracy rate hovered around 60 percent. He proclaimed that his government would eradicate illiteracy within ten years, but despite a huge jump in the numbers of students attending public schools, the illiteracy rate still topped 50 percent a decade after the president's proclamation. The problem seemed intransigent in part because of Syria's rapid population growth, which, at 3.7 percent a year, was among the world's highest and outstripped the government's ability to provide teachers and classrooms. For those students who did manage to complete a secondary education, free tuition and open admissions encouraged entry into university. Although this policy had the positive effect of expanding the opportunities for university education to all segments of Syrian society, it had the negative impact of creating overcrowded classrooms and reducing educational standards.

Under the al-Asad regime, central government tightly controlled all levels of the educational system and used the classroom as a forum for indoctrinating students into Ba'thist ideology. The aim was to instill obedience to authority and devotion to the party principles. The regime's manipulation of education was particularly striking at the university level: The party and the security services screened faculty appointments and regulated admissions, making sure that those who had the opportunity to advance in society were individuals who had conformed to correct political behavior.

For all its restrictions on political and intellectual freedoms, the al-Asad regime pushed ahead with social reforms. It made a public commitment to female equality by legislating equal rights and privileges for women. Women served as parliamentary representatives and began to enter the professions and the judiciary, and al-Asad's minister of culture in 1976 was a woman. However, popular practice did not necessarily conform to the legal code, and conservative social attitudes continued to limit women's participation in the work force. Moreover, al-Asad's opponents used the regime's encouragement of female emancipation to emphasize the government's secularism and lack of respect for Islamic values.

As the regime sought to implement the original Ba'th principle of social transformation, it also imposed political rigidity, cultural uniformity, and intellectual obedience. This was the contradiction of a government committed on the one hand to principles of reform and on the other to the preservation of an authoritarian military regime. The transformation of Syria was to be controlled by the state, not fueled by the creative energy of individuals. And in the end the state was stifling, inefficient, and oppressive.

Syria in the Middle East: The Bid for Dominance

For al-Asad, the conflict with Israel took precedence over all other foreign policy considerations. In his view, Israel was an expansionist state whose ambitions were underwritten by the United States. He believed that it was Syria's duty to resist the Israeli threat and to work for Arab unity. Al-Asad's concern with Israel reflected the opinion of most Syrians, who felt more keenly about the loss of Palestine than did the inhabitants of other, more distant Arab states. During the late Ottoman period, the territory that eventually became the Palestine mandate was regarded as part of southern Syria, and its transformation into the state of Israel stirred strong emotions among Syrians.

Al-Asad realized that if Syria were to lead the Arab struggle against Israel, the country's armed forces would have to be upgraded. He persuaded Syria's principal arms supplier, the Soviet Union, to increase the quantity and quality of weapons it provided. Thus he launched a huge buildup that saw Syria's armed forces grow from 50,000 in 1967 to 225,000 in 1973 to over 400,000 in the early 1980s. Such unprecedented expansion was costly. By the early 1980s, Syria was devoting over 20 percent of its gross national product (GNP) to military expenditures, severely straining the national economy.

Al-Asad's overriding concern was to recover the Golan Heights, the territory Syria had lost to Israel in 1967. He was convinced this could and should be achieved on the battlefield. Only by demonstrating military competence would the Arabs be taken seriously in the international community. Al-Asad found a willing ally for his position in President Sadat of Egypt. Together, they planned the military action of October 1973. Although the war began well for the two Arab allies, it ended in defeat for Syria and a somewhat tarnished triumph for Egypt. Nevertheless, the battle for the Golan Heights had been closely contested, and the new Syrian army had performed capably. Al-Asad had reason to believe that in time an Arab coalition could recover the Israeli-held territories. The possibility of finding credible partners to form such a coalition diminished when Egypt abandoned the campaign against Israel.

In Chapter 19, we saw how Sadat engaged in the tortuous negotiations that finally took him to Washington for the signing of an Egyptian-Israeli peace treaty in 1979. From al-Asad's perspective, Sadat had betrayed the Arab cause by becoming a participant in the imposition of a US-Israeli order on the Middle East. The Syrian president resolved that this order should not prevail. Because there appeared to be no reliable Arab allies committed to resisting it, al-Asad decided that Syria itself would do so by achieving military parity with Israel. This decision led to the enormous arms buildup mentioned above.

In attempting to achieve military parity with Israel, al-Asad was also planning to make Syria the most powerful state in the Arab world. In effect, he had launched a bid for regional hegemony that would enable Syria to control the Arabs' response to the presence of Israel. This was an expensive policy but not a reckless one. It fit al-Asad's calculating nature. His goal was to dominate the states that fell naturally within Syria's orbit—Lebanon and Jordan—as well as the PLO. Syria, through its military power, would intimidate these states and prevent them from making peace with Israel as Egypt had done. Syria would also attempt to restrain them, especially the PLO, from undertaking activities that would give Israel an excuse to attack Syria before its arms buildup was complete.

Al-Asad's regional policy was popular within Syria and helped to solidify his domestic position during the early years of his rule. Within the Arab world at large, he was seen as a possible successor to Nasser in the drive for Pan-Arab unity. However, al-Asad's embroilment in the Lebanese civil war undermined his reputation and brought his leadership into question both at home and in the wider Arab world. As we saw in Chapter 19, Syria intervened in Lebanon in 1976 on the side of the Maronite Christians against the leftist Muslim-PLO alliance. Al-Asad had gambled on being able to determine the outcome of the civil strife, but instead Syrian forces had become bogged down in a costly and indecisive military occupation. And by sending his army against the PLO, al-Asad, the supposed champion of the Palestinians, raised doubts about the sincerity of his commitment to their cause.

If al-Asad had risked Arab disapproval with his intervention in Lebanon, he was to take an even bolder step during the Iran-Iraq war of 1980–1988, discussed in the following section. The long-standing rivalry between Syria and Iraq intensified in the 1970s when both states came under the rule of different factions of the Ba'th Party. Each accused the other of deviating from true Ba'thist principles, and the propaganda machines of Damascus and Baghdad hurled vitriolic insults across the airwaves. The Iranian revolution of 1979 that toppled the shah and brought to power a militant Shi'a Islamic regime under Ayatollah Khomeini inflamed the tensions between Syria and Iraq. President Saddam Husayn of Iraq feared that Khomeini's call for Islamic revolution might affect Iraq's restless Shi'a majority. Husayn therefore set out to destroy the new Iranian regime by invading Iraq in 1980. Most other Arab states supported Iraq in the long war that followed, but not Syria. Al-Asad broke ranks with the Arab world—and with Sunni Arab opinion—and sided with non-Arab Shi'a Iran. Al-Asad saw Khomeini's regime as a protest against the US-Israeli order, and he believed the Arabs should support the new government in Tehran. But al-Asad's position was lost on other Arab leaders, and Syria became increasingly isolated within the Arab world.

Despite this isolation, Syria, largely because of its new military power, managed to acquire the regional influence al-Asad had sought. By the mid-1980s, Syria was in a position to ensure that no Arab-Israeli peace settlement could be negotiated without Syria's participation and that Syrian action could sabotage any peace proposals that might emerge from other parties.

The Crisis Within: The Islamic Opposition

The Syrian public objected to al-Asad's intervention against the PLO in Lebanon and his support for Iran in its war with Iraq; an opposition movement arose that nearly overthrew his government. Factors having little to do with foreign policy also inspired the opposition: It was a conservative Muslim and Sunni protest against an Alawite regime that was overtly secular and reformist, it was an urban protest against a regime that catered to rural and minority groups at the expense of the once dominant urban families, and it was a popular protest against a regime that spawned a new elite of wealthy party and government officials, a regime that was corrupt as well as repressive.

Concentrated in the old commercial cities of Aleppo, Homs, and Hama, the opposition was spearheaded by young militants associated with the Syrian branch of the Muslim Brotherhood. Ever since the Ba'th took power in 1963, there had been outbreaks of Islamic-inspired protest against the party's secularizing tendencies. The discontent resurfaced in 1976 with a wave of violent attacks on government and party officials, especially prominent Alawites. The singling out of members of the Alawite sect emphasized the strong Sunni character of the opposition. Throughout the late 1970s, the antiregime forces intensified their activities, mainly through a campaign of urban guerrilla warfare against the government. Various militant organizations formed an Islamic Front with the declared aim of overthrowing the regime and establishing an Islamic state in Syria. The front's proclamations emphasized al-Asad's Alawite origins and labeled him a heretic. The success of the Islamic Front's operations attracted a cross-section of disaffected Syrians who resented the regime's authoritarianism, favoritism, and corruption.

Al-Asad's security forces made hundreds of arrests, but the violence spread. In 1980, the Islamic Front destroyed government installations in Damascus, and the protest movement took on the features of a full-scale rebellion. Antiregime forces achieved their most stunning victory in February 1982 when they seized control of parts of the city of Hama and called on all Syrians to join in a jihad against the government. Al-Asad responded to the Hama rebellion with ferocious brutality. The Syrian military, under the overall direction of his younger brother, Rif‘at al-Asad, opened a deadly campaign against the city and its civilian population. Heavy artillery shelled the old urban quarters where the rebels hid, and tanks smashed through the rubble, demolishing whatever remained. Churches, mosques, and houses were destroyed and entire districts razed. When the military operation was halted after two weeks, the al-Asad regime had preserved itself and crushed the rebellion, but at a terrible cost. Large portions of Hama lay in ruins, and at least 10,000 of its inhabitants had been killed by their own government’s armed forces. The events at Hama sent a collective chill of fear through Syrian society. Hafiz al-Asad warned other potential dissidents that his regime would use all the force at its disposal to remain in power.

The next serious challenge to al-Asad’s authority came from within his own ruling group. For several months in 1983 and 1984, the president was recuperating from a heart attack and rarely appeared in public. During this period, his brother Rif‘at, commander of the elite Defense Companies, made a bold bid for power. He placed his Defense Companies in strategic positions in and around Damascus; generals loyal to the president moved their forces to the capital city to oppose Rif‘at. Syria again teetered on the verge of conflict between factions within the armed forces. However, al-Asad’s adroit handling of the crisis prevented violence, and he reassured his authority. The regime edged Rif‘at out of power and out of Syria.

Al-Asad again stood supreme, but his triumph over the Hama rebels and over his own brother in Damascus showed that his authority rested not on popular consent or civilian institutions but on the loyalty of the armed forces. In the aftermath of these two crises, the regime became more repressive and remote, and al-Asad became “more an object of orchestrated adulation” than had been the case previously.² The development of a personality cult around the president suggested a certain insecurity on the part of al-Asad and his advisers, a feeling that the regime’s unpopular policies could be explained away by raising the image of the president to the level of one whose wisdom was beyond the comprehension of the average citizen. Thus were the trappings of dictatorship consolidated.

IRAQ IN THE ERA OF SADDAM HUSAYN AND THE BA‘TH

The Rise of Saddam Husayn

The coup that overthrew the monarchy in 1958 launched Iraq into a period of political and social instability (see Chapter 16). When another coup d’état occurred in 1968—the third such event of the decade—it appeared to be just another in the series of political convulsions that regularly plagued Iraq. However, the 1968 coup brought to power a determined group of individuals who established a stable regime that would endure for thirty-five years. The figure who molded the regime’s character and set its policies was Saddam Husayn.

Like al-Asad of Syria, Husayn was a man of humble rural origins who used the Ba‘th Party as a stepping stone to the presidency of his country. Husayn differed from al-Asad in that he came from the Sunni Arab community, which, though a minority, has dominated the central administration of the region from Ottoman times to the present. Husayn was born in 1937 to a family of landless peasants in Takrit, a middle-level administrative town on the Tigris. His father died before he was born, and he was raised in the home of an uncle who had participated in the Rashid Ali uprising against the British in 1941 and was imprisoned when the revolt was crushed. Reportedly Husayn was deeply affected by his uncle’s lingering hostility toward the British and the British-backed monarchy.

At age eighteen, Husayn moved to Baghdad to begin high school. His involvement in political activity interrupted his studies. He joined the rising tide of protest against the monarchy and, in 1957, became a member of the Ba‘th Party. In 1959, he participated in a daring and unsuccessful attempt to assassinate the Iraqi president, Abd al-Karim Qasim. Husayn escaped arrest and fled the country, eventually settling in Cairo, where, at age twenty-four, he completed high school.

When the Ba‘th seized control in Baghdad in 1963, Husayn returned to Iraq but was imprisoned when the Ba‘th regime was overthrown after only a few months in power. He spent two years in jail and then escaped and resumed his activities on the party's behalf. The Ba'th was in the midst of an extensive reorganization directed by Ahmad Hasan al-Bakr (1914–1982), a former military officer and prime minister who also hailed from Takrit and was related to Saddam Husayn. In 1966, al-Bakr arranged for the appointment of his young relative as the deputy secretary general of the Ba'th.

From 1964 to 1968, Husayn's experiences as political prisoner, party organizer, and conspiratorial plotter shaped his attitude toward political conduct. Because the Ba'th was a banned opposition party, Husayn's duties had to be carried out underground. As a result, he developed a secretive decision-making style and a tendency to be suspicious and distrustful of those around him. He also developed a reputation as a man not to be crossed.

In July 1968, the Ba'th and its allies overthrew the regime of Arif and established a new government in which Hasan al-Bakr held the offices of president and prime minister. Al-Bakr also chaired the newly formed Revolutionary Command Council (RCC), an inner circle of close associates that served as the main decision-making body within the state. His fellow Takriti Saddam Husayn became vice chairman of the RCC in 1969. The new regime consolidated its control in the usual manner by purging the officer corps and the higher ranks of civil servants and appointing Ba'th loyalists to the vacated positions. From the outset, the regime was ruthless in its treatment of those whose loyalties were suspect. Hundreds received lengthy prison terms, and others were hanged in public executions intended to remind Iraqis of the fate that awaited any who dared oppose the regime. By the end of 1970, the number of "official" executions stood at eighty-six.

As the regime ferreted out its enemies, it sought to identify its friends. Just as al-Asad in Syria had depended on his fellow Alawites for support, so al-Bakr and Husayn turned to their associates and kinsmen from Takrit. In the regime's early years, Takritis were appointed to key positions in all the organizations that propped up the government. Thus, at one point in 1973, Takritis held four of the nine memberships on the RCC; all the principal posts in the party, army, and government; and the commands of the air force, the Baghdad garrison, and the tank regiment of the Republican Guard. Their role was so critical that one historian has remarked that "the Takritis rule through the Ba‘th party, rather than the Ba‘th party through the Takritis.”³ The national prominence of individuals from the same modest-sized town, several of them related by blood or marriage ties, gave the politics of the regime a personal rather than an institutional or ideological tone.

The Takriti who cast an increasingly large shadow over the workings of the regime was Saddam Husayn. His power derived from his authority within the civilian ranks of the Ba‘th Party, his control of a new Ba‘th militia, and his position as head of a complex network of security agencies that provided him with information he used to determine who rose and who fell. By the early 1970s, Husayn had emerged as the real force behind the regime. However, al-Bakr continued to play an important role. As a former officer, he had contacts within the armed forces, and he used his presidential powers to expand Ba‘thist influence among the officer corps. By all accounts, the senior al-Bakr and the young Husayn worked together effectively, and their regime carried out impressive economic and social reforms.

Their political objective during the 1970s was to establish a one-party state, and they successfully extended the Ba‘th into all aspects of Iraqi society. Labor unions, student federations, and women’s groups all came under party control. The officer corps was also brought within the party’s orbit, and party membership determined promotion. An important transformation occurred in 1977 when all members of the Ba‘thist ruling council became members of the RCC; this development virtually removed the distinctions between party and state.

In 1976, al-Bakr appointed Husayn, who had no military background, to the rank of general in the army. Husayn’s insertion into the military hierarchy reduced the importance of al-Bakr, and in 1979, he resigned. Husayn immediately succeeded him as president, secretary general of the Ba‘th Party, chairman of the RCC, and commander in chief of the armed forces. To ensure his retention of state power, Husayn ordered another round of purges and executions of Ba‘thist officials and military officers whose loyalties he deemed suspect. Throughout the ensuing years, Husayn concentrated ever-greater powers into his hands until his regime became a one-man dictatorship.

Domestic Policy: Ethnic and Religious Tensions with the Kurds and Shi'a

The Iraqi state as created by Britain contained an enormously diverse population (see Chapter 11). The majority of the inhabitants of Iraq were Shi'a Arabs who lived mainly in the southern part of the country. The Shi'a were economically and politically disadvantaged by the system put in place by Britain and perpetuated by the independent regimes since 1932. In addition, a large minority of Kurds inhabited the oil-rich north. The post-1968 Ba'thist regime, for all its aggressive centralization of political authority, had difficulty controlling Shi'a expressions of discontent and Kurdish demands for independence.

The contentious issue of the status of the Kurds within Iraqi society troubled the Ba'thist regime of Husayn and al-Bakr as much as, if not more than, it had the preceding governments. At its most basic, the Kurdish question was a dispute between a people who sought autonomy and a government that wished to assert centralized control—between a culturally and linguistically distinct minority who claimed their own nationality and a ruling elite committed to the primacy of Arab nationalism.

When the Ba'th seized power in 1968, the Kurdish region was once again in a state of rebellion. Although in 1970 Saddam Husayn personally negotiated an agreement that recognized Kurdish autonomy, the agreement was not implemented, and by 1974, the on-again, off-again conflict between Baghdad and the Kurds had escalated into full-scale warfare. The government forces were able to use their advantage in firepower to make initial gains, but they could not penetrate the mountain strongholds, and the conflict reached a stalemate. In this instance, the Iraqi government's position was made more difficult by the attitude of its neighbor, Iran.

The shah of Iran—a conservative monarch, US ally, and ruler with ambitions to extend his country's influence in the Persian Gulf region—was alarmed at the emergence in Baghdad of a Ba'thist regime that mouthed revolutionary slogans, procured its weapons from the Soviet Union, and had its own designs on controlling the northern Gulf. Iran was only too willing to weaken the Baghdad government by providing aid to the Kurdish rebellion in Iraq. During the 1974–1975 fighting, the shah sent weapons and contingents of Iranian Kurds to assist the rebels; he also offered Iraqi Kurds sanctuary in Iran. Then, in what seemed like a sudden about-face for both states, in 1975, Iraq and Iran concluded a treaty known as the Algiers Agreement. Iraq conceded a long-standing Iranian demand to redefine the boundary along the Shatt al-Arab waterway; Iran in turn pledged to close its borders to Iraqi Kurds and to cease assisting the rebellion in Iraq.

The agreement was a disaster for the Kurds of Iraq. Denied the opportunity to disperse their forces across the Iranian border—or the Turkish border, which had been closed to them earlier—they were decimated by the Iraqi air force and compelled to seek a cease-fire in summer 1975. Once the Ba‘thist regime was assured of military victory, it implemented a reconstruction plan that granted the Kurds a limited degree of cultural and political autonomy as well as providing them with considerable funds for local development projects. But there was another—and brutal—side to Baghdad’s Kurdish policy. To reduce the chances of a future rebellion, the government uprooted as many as 250,000 Kurds and relocated them in the central and southern regions of the country. The authorities also forced large numbers of Arabs to move to Kurdish territory so as to dilute the Kurdish majority in certain mixed provinces. This was a policy of pacification, not of peace, and the Kurdish people recognized it as such. Despite the obstacles facing them, they managed to resurrect their resistance movement by the late 1970s. That movement was given a new impetus by the war with Iran and then burst again into the open in 1991 in the immediate aftermath of the Gulf War (see Chapter 22).

The interactions of the Shi‘a community with the central government differed from those of the Kurds. Because the Shi‘a had become diversified, they were not a monolithic community with a common attitude toward the government. After World War II, thousands of Shi‘a migrated from the rural south to Baghdad, where they became integrated into national life as members of the labor force and the civil service. Whatever grievances this segment of the Shi‘a community may have had against the regime, they were based more on economic and political considerations than on religious ones.

Among the rural Shi‘a of the south, however, religious identity continued to be important, and the ulama’s influence remained strong. The leading ulama and their followers opposed the Ba‘th regime on three grounds: its secularism, its refusal to appoint Shi‘a to the higher echelons of the government or the party, and its attempts to dominate all organizations within society, including religious institutions. Shi‘a protest was expressed through the formation of a secret, ulama-led organization known as al-Da‘wa (Islamic Call), which advocated the overthrow of the regime and the establishment of an Islamic government. Large-scale Shi‘a anti-government demonstrations broke out in 1977 and again in 1979 during the pilgrimage rites in the holy cities of Karbala and Najaf. Alarmed by the protest’s scope, the regime arrested large numbers of individuals suspected of belonging to al-Da‘wa and executed a prominent member of the ulama who was one of the organization’s leaders. These acts of repression in 1979 occurred just at the time Ayatollah Khomeini took power in Iran and issued his appeal for Islamic revolution. The Baghdad regime’s uncertainty over the loyalty of its Shi‘a population in the face of the ayatollah’s appeal was one of the factors that led it to invade Iran in 1980. As shown by the Kurdish rebellion and the Shi‘ite protest movement, Iraq’s national unity remained fragile, even after fifty years of statehood.

Domestic Policy: Economic Development and Social Transformation

Western-owned companies’ total control over the production, marketing, and pricing of Middle Eastern oil was a constant reminder of the region’s continuing dependence on the West and a constant irritant to Arab nationalists. In Iraq, each of the regimes that ruled after the revolution of 1958 attempted to acquire control of the country’s petroleum resources from the foreign-owned Iraq Petroleum Company (IPC). IPC was a consortium of several Western companies, Britain having the greatest share; it completely dominated all aspects of the Iraqi petroleum industry after World War II and showed little inclination to relinquish its power. But in 1972, the Ba‘th regime, frustrated with IPC’s unyielding stance, proclaimed the nationalization of the company, an event of major political and economic significance. For one thing, it was by far the most popular measure the regime had taken and contributed substantially to its acceptance. From an economic perspective, the nationalization of IPC brought benefits to Iraq that could not have been foreseen at the time. The government gained control of Iraq’s oil resources on the eve of the momentous price revolution that accompanied the 1973 Arab-Israeli war.

For example, Iraq's 1968 oil revenues amounted to $476 million; in 1980, the figure rocketed to $26 billion.

Enriched by the influx of oil revenues, the regime embarked on an ambitious program of industrial development and social reform. The Ba'thists of Iraq, like their counterparts in Syria, were committed to a socialist economy that allowed some scope for private enterprise. The public sector took the lead with investments in such heavy industries as iron, steel, and petrochemicals. Although Iraqi industry suffered from low productivity because of a shortage of skilled labor and trained management, there was nevertheless sufficient progress to prompt some to predict that by the year 2000 Iraq would join the ranks of the minor industrial powers. But the country's civilian economic sector ground to a halt during the war with Iran, and then US bombing raids during the Gulf War of 1991 destroyed the state's entire infrastructure.

In the countryside, the regime struck hard at the remnants of the old rural elite and provided new opportunities for peasants to obtain land. In 1970, a new agrarian reform law placed further limitations on the size of landholdings and authorized the government to expropriate additional acreage from large landowners. Although the government rented out some of the land it seized, it redistributed most to small owners or landless peasants. The redistribution was extensive; between 1970 and 1982, 264,400 farmers received land grants. The regime also supported the formation of agricultural cooperatives and experimented, unsuccessfully, with large collective farms. Although the land reforms altered the social structure of the countryside, they did not contribute to an improvement in agricultural production. In Iraq, as in Syria, agriculture received a low priority from the regime, and food imports rose steadily as agricultural production stagnated.

Its oil wealth allowed Iraq to pursue the creation of a social welfare state. The government reduced taxes, subsidized basic foodstuffs, established free health care, and abolished university tuitions. When combined with the plentiful employment that accompanied the extensive development schemes, these measures brought better living conditions and higher income levels to the population at large. Thus, though the Ba'th regime of al-Bakr and Husayn may not have been loved, the prosperity that accompanied its consolidation of power in the 1970s at least led to its acceptance.

In keeping with its secular, reformist outlook, the government improved the legal status of women and increased their opportunities to acquire education and employment. In 1978, amendments to the personal status law outlawed forced marriages, expanded the grounds on which women could obtain divorces, and made polygamy contingent on obtaining the permission of a judge. Women's access to education was also enhanced, and by 1982, more than 30 percent of university students were female. In what was a new direction for Iraqi society, the regime sought to attract women into the work force by setting up child care centers, offering paid maternity leave, and requiring equal pay for equal work.

To boost productivity, the regime conducted a robust campaign against illiteracy. Launched in 1978, the campaign targeted not just the school-age population but mature citizens as well. The government opened thousands of literacy centers and required Iraqis to attend them for a minimum of two years. Similar attention was devoted to the regular school system, and the number of students in primary and secondary schools rose dramatically during the 1970s. The regime used the educational system to propagate Ba'ath doctrines and to monitor political behavior. Courses in Ba'thist ideology were mandatory for all university students, and the regime tried to make certain that only party members received faculty appointments.

During the Ba'ath regime's first decade in power, it was responsible for generating a change in the social composition of the ruling elite. The highest positions in the party, the government, and the membership of the RCC itself came to be held by individuals of lower-class rural origins. In this regard, developments in Iraq were similar to those in Syria, and the rise of the Takriti villagers was comparable to the rise of the Alawites. Political authority in Iraq was exercised by men who had rural upbringings and rural educations, men with little university education and who had rarely studied or lived outside the Middle East. These men and their dominant leader, Saddam Husayn, embroiled Iraq in a series of complicated foreign policy confrontations that revealed how poorly they understood the wider world—and how poorly the wider world understood them.

Foreign Policy

From 1968 to the end of the war with Iran in 1988, Iraqi foreign policy underwent a considerable modification. When the Ba‘th regime came to power, Iraq was isolated from the West and aligned with the Soviet Union, on which it depended for arms purchases and technical expertise. The solid relationship between the two countries was symbolized by the signing of a fifteen-year Iraqi-Soviet friendship treaty in 1972.

Although Iraq maintained its ties to the Soviet Union, it was gradually drawn out of its isolation from the West and into the global economy because of its petroleum industry. Iraq’s development projects and social welfare programs relied heavily on the revenues generated by oil. The regime recognized this dependence and sought efficient technical and marketing assistance wherever it could find them, including Japan and the West. According to the Iraqi minister of planning in 1975, “What we want is the best technology and the fastest possible fulfillment of orders and contracts.”⁴ This pragmatic approach led the regime to award construction projects to US, British, and French firms. By the late 1970s, Western countries were also competing to gain a foothold in Iraq’s lucrative arms market. France won a contract to supply Mirage fighter aircraft and 200 tanks, and Italy agreed to provide the regime with sophisticated naval vessels. Despite this diversification in its sources of technical expertise and arms supplies, Iraq continued to rely on the Soviet Union for the bulk of its military purchases. In its official outlook toward the superpowers, the regime took a pro-Soviet, anti-US position. But in terms of economic development, especially within the petroleum industry, the Ba‘th adopted a pragmatic policy and imported as much Western technology and advice as it could buy.

Within the Middle East, the regime at first projected an image of revolutionary radicalism. It rejected UN Resolution 242 on the settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict, it participated in the 1973 war by sending troops to the Syrian front, and it denounced the Egyptian-Israeli treaty of 1979. Yet for all its strident rejectionism on matters concerning Israel, Iraq’s real opportunity to exercise regional influence lay in the Persian Gulf. The regime made a clumsy attempt at expansionism in 1973 when, in a preview of the events of 1990, Iraqi forces occupied a post inside the Kuwaiti border and demanded that Kuwait cede two offshore islands to Baghdad. A concerted response by Saudi Arabia and the Arab League averted a major crisis, and Iraq withdrew. Following the resolution of its outstanding differences with Iran through the Algiers Agreement of 1975, Iraq's relations with its Gulf neighbors improved markedly; as it expanded its economic ties to the West, the regime adopted a more temperate foreign policy within the Arab world. The new policy paved the way for Iraq to cooperate with the moderate Arab states and to acquire an influence in Arab circles that elevated Saddam Husayn to regional prominence. Husayn's ambition to have Iraq assume the leadership of the Pan-Arab movement did not appear unrealistic in the late 1970s.

THE IRAN-IRAQ WAR, 1980–1988

In 1979, the shah of Iran was deposed in a popular revolution inspired by the rhetoric of Ayatollah Khomeini. The regime that emerged out of the revolution, the Islamic Republic of Iran, called for the spread of Islamic revolution in every region of the Middle East. With the advent of the Islamic Republic and its militant Shi'a vision of Islam, the tensions between Iran and Iraq, papered over in the 1975 Algiers Agreement, were once again brought into the open.

The issues that divided the two countries ranged from the long-standing cultural rivalry between Arab and Persian civilizations to immediate disputes over frontiers and navigation rights, to conflicting interpretations of the role of nationalism and religion in public life. One of the most sensitive questions for Iraq was the northern border. The Kurds had taken advantage of the turmoil surrounding the Iranian revolution to resume their armed insurrection against the regime of Saddam Husayn. The new Iranian government refused to close its borders to Kurds seeking refuge from the Iraqi army, thus violating the terms of the 1975 agreement.

But to the Iraqi regime, the most disconcerting challenge posed by Khomeini was his direct appeal to Iraq's Shi'a to overthrow Husayn. This was not only a political threat to the regime's existence but also an ideological threat that pitted the universalist principles of Islam against the Ba'th's secular nationalism. A year before assuming power, Khomeini had specifically identified Saddam Husayn and his “infidel Ba‘th party” as enemies of Islam. In 1980, following Husayn’s suppression of Shi‘a disturbances and the execution of a leading Shi‘a clergyman, Khomeini asserted that “the people and army of Iraq must turn their backs on the Ba‘th regime and overthrow it.” In the same speech, Khomeini charged the Iraqi regime with “attacking Islam and the Quran.”⁵

It appeared to Husayn that the Iranian government was endeavoring to destabilize his regime by aiding the Kurdish rebellion, encouraging a Shi‘a uprising, and denouncing the legitimacy of Ba‘thist rule. He resolved to topple Khomeini’s government before it could fully consolidate its power. In this decision Husayn had the support of the oil-rich monarchs of Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, and the smaller Gulf states, for whom Khomeini’s brand of populist, revolutionary Islam was anathema; he also had the support of the United States.

In an appearance on Iraqi television on September 17, 1980, Husayn announced the abrogation of the Algiers Agreement. To emphasize his point, he ceremoniously ripped up the official copy of the document. Five days later, Iraqi forces invaded Iran in what was intended to be a brief military operation against a foe in disarray. Instead, Husayn launched the longest conventional war of the twentieth century, a horrible conflict that cost hundreds of billions of dollars and took hundreds of thousands of lives.

In the first month of fighting, Iraq occupied 10,000 square miles (26,000 square kilometers) of Iranian territory along a front running 375 miles (600 kilometers) north to south (see Map 21.1). However, Iraqi casualties ran higher than anticipated, and the Iranian resistance was much stiffer than expected. Husayn had miscalculated the effect the invasion would have on the Iranian population. Rather than turning against the Khomeini regime, they rallied to it, displaying a degree of patriotism and loyalty that allowed the government to weather the initial setbacks and regroup for a counteroffensive. Moreover, the military arsenal the shah had accumulated was in some respects superior to Iraq’s, and the Iranian armed forces were not nearly as decimated by the turmoil of the revolution as Husayn had been led to believe. Between November 1981 and May 1982, Iran mounted a series of counterattacks that drove the Iraqi forces back across the border and placed Iraq on the defensive. For the next six years, the war was fought mainly on Iraqi soil, and there were moments when it appeared that either the port city of Basra or the capital, Baghdad, would fall to Iran. But for most of the period from 1982 to 1988, the conflict settled into a dreary war of attrition punctuated by episodic Iranian offensives spearheaded by waves of human attackers that resulted in appalling casualties.

MAP 21.1. Iraq and Iran in the 1980s.

In the air war, Iraqi planes raided Iranian cities in an attempt to demoralize the population. In return, the Iranian air force destroyed the port installations at Basra, put the southern oil fields out of commission, and made damaging strikes on the important fields in the north. The bombings crippled Iraq's oil industry and thus reduced the country's income at a time of soaring military expenditures. In 1984, the war of attrition spread to the Persian Gulf shipping lanes when Iraq, seeking to reduce Iran's oil-exporting ability, started to attack tankers bound for Iranian ports. Iran retaliated with raids against ships that traded with Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, Iraq's major Gulf allies.

With its oil-exporting capacity limited, Iraq had to borrow abroad to finance the war. Kuwait and Saudi Arabia were the major lenders, and together they supplied Iraq with between $50 billion and $60 billion worth of assistance during the conflict. Iraq's growing economic dependence on the pro-Western Arab Gulf states prompted Husayn's regime to modify its attitude toward US allies in the region. Baghdad changed its rejectionist stance toward Israel and restored cordial relations with Egypt. In return, Egypt supplied Iraq with ammunition, spare military parts, and military advisers.

Throughout the war, the Soviet Union was Iraq's major arms supplier. But Western powers also came to Baghdad's aid. France, which was deeply involved in several large development projects in Iraq, provided Husayn's forces with Mirage jets and Super-Etandard war planes equipped with Exocet missiles. In 1984, diplomatic relations between Washington and Baghdad, severed in 1967, were restored, and the United States started to provide Iraq with military intelligence. The United States also pressured its allies not to sell weapons to Iran and, in the war's final year, campaigned for an embargo against Iranian oil. When Iran stepped up its attacks on Kuwaiti shipping in 1987, the United States allowed Kuwait's vessels to fly the US flag, thus making an attack on them equivalent to an attack on a US ship. Washington also reinforced its naval presence in the Gulf, and on several occasions in 1987 and 1988, US gunboats engaged in direct military actions against Iran.

Although the US government and media directed nearly hysterical criticism toward Saddam Husayn and his regime during the 1990–1991 crisis, we should recall how crucial US assistance to Iraq was during the earlier war. For the United States in the 1980s, the demon of the Middle East was Ayatollah Khomeini, not Saddam Husayn, and Washington was willing to ignore the brutality of Husayn's regime so as to prevent the spread of the kind of Islamic radicalism and anti-US sentiment Khomeini represented. What was at stake for the United States in this war, as in that of 1991, was not human rights but oil reserves. The pro-Western Arab Gulf states controlled over half the world's known supply of oil. If Iraq were defeated, then it seemed likely that the Gulf states would either fall to Iran or, at the very least, come within Iran's orbit. This was a frightening prospect for the US government, and it therefore lent its support to Iraq.

The United States' military and diplomatic intervention on behalf of Husayn's government played a vital role in persuading Iran's leaders to seek an end to the war.

In spring 1988, the Iranians launched a final offensive that succeeded in capturing the Kurdish town of Halabja in northern Iraq. The Iraqi air force responded by bombing the town with poison gas, killing at least 5,000 of its civilian inhabitants. This was not the first instance of Iraq's use of chemical weapons in the conflict, but the regime's decision to deploy them against its own population was a sign of the ruthlessness with which it was prepared to conduct the war. Iraq's possession of chemical weapons and the possibility that it might launch missiles armed with poison gas at Iranian population centers was another factor in persuading the Khomeini regime to accept a truce.

On August 20, 1988, a UN-sponsored cease-fire took effect, and the long war ended. Neither side had achieved its objectives. Instead of toppling the Iranian government, Saddam Husayn's invasion had strengthened it. And Ayatollah Khomeini's assertion that Iran would never agree to a truce as long as Husayn retained power had to be reversed. As for the border dispute, it remained unresolved until 1990, when Husayn offered to restore the Algiers Agreement he had publicly torn up a decade earlier. Nothing, it seemed, had changed. The costs of achieving so little were staggering. Iran's war dead were estimated at 262,000; Iraq's at 105,000. The war devastated Iraq's economy: The port facilities at Basra were destroyed, the ambitious civilian development projects had been abandoned, and austerity measures had been adopted. Moreover, Iraq emerged from the conflict with a paralyzing foreign debt, estimated at $80 billion, over half of which was owed to the Arab Gulf states. The requirements of servicing the debt limited the funds Iraq could devote to much-needed reconstruction.

Although the Kurds remained defiant, the war solidified sentiments of Iraqi national identity among the bulk of the population. Because of the regime's concern over the loyalty of the Shi'as, it blended measures of conciliation toward the community with continued policies of repression. Greater numbers of Shi'as were appointed to high-ranking posts within the Ba'th Party and the armed forces, and President Husayn sought to project an image of himself as a concerned Muslim by visiting the Shi'a holy sites and assuring the population that the Ba‘th upheld Islamic principles. The vast majority of Iraq’s Shi‘as chose to side with their Arab identity over their religious affiliation and remained loyal to the government during the war. It was evident that they had no desire to come under Iranian domination.

Iraq’s armed forces grew in wartime from 190,000 to more than 1 million, and the country became a major regional military power. It developed a burgeoning armaments industry capable of producing everything from light arms and ammunition to Scud missiles and chemical weapons. With materials and equipment acquired primarily from European firms, Iraqi scientists were working intently on the development of nuclear capability. As the armed forces evolved into the state’s key institution, Iraqi society became militarized. The government glorified military virtues, and Husayn’s daily television appearances wearing an officer’s uniform emphasized his close ties to the armed forces. His control of the military strengthened his grip on total power. However, despite the participation of all sectors of Iraqi society in the war effort, Husayn’s power base remained narrow, and he continued to appoint mainly members of his extended family and trusted long-term associates to sensitive positions in the armed forces, the security services, and the RCC. The war also intensified the personality cult that was built up around Husayn. So numerous were the posters and statues of the president that some Iraqis joked that the true population of their country was 28 million—14 million people and 14 million statues of Saddam Husayn.

PHOTO 21.1. A monumental portrait of Iraq's President Saddam Husayn. It was unveiled during ceremonies in 1990 to celebrate his fifty-third birthday.

Assessments of Iraq's economic position in 1988 concluded that the country's prospects for recovery were far from hopeless. If expenditures on the military were reduced and the substantial revenue from oil exports channeled into reconstruction, then Iraq stood a good chance of being able to meet its debts and attain modest economic growth. But the regime gave rearmament priority over reconstruction; during the two-year period from 1988 to 1989, Iraq spent $10 billion on military equipment. It was partly because of these vast military expenditures that Husayn was moved to achieve Iraq's economic recovery by annexing Kuwait in 1990. This adventure proved even more ruinous to Iraq than the ill-conceived war with Iran.

CONCLUSION

The writings of its cofounder, Michel Aflaq, defined the Ba'th Party in romantic and stirring language. It was to be an instrument for social justice and a vanguard organization with the eternal mission of bringing about Arab unity. The Ba‘th’s platform offered the appealing vision of an Arab renaissance, and the party attracted young Arabs of the postindependence era eager for a cause and for the restoration of Arab dignity. However, Aflaq’s intentions for the party were thwarted as it divided into regional groupings and quarreling factions. This reality was most evident in Syria and Iraq, where the Ba‘th came under the control of ambitious men who used its apparatus and ideology to serve their own ends. For al-Asad and Husayn, the Ba‘th became an instrument of control and indoctrination that assured the survival of their regimes. Both leaders justified their rule in the name of Ba‘thist principles, but instead of using the party’s ideology to prepare the foundations of Arab unity, they used it to criticize one another and to buttress their individual claims to regional supremacy. In the hands of al-Asad and Husayn, the Ba‘th lost its Pan-Arab mission and developed rival Syrian and Iraqi branches, each of which sought to undermine the other. One of the victims of their rivalry was Aflaq himself. Expelled from Syria by a Ba‘th regime that no longer needed him but feared his appeal, he was welcomed by Husayn, who trumpeted his presence in Baghdad as proof that the Iraqi Ba‘th had remained true to the principles of the party’s founder.

Both regimes practiced a combination of political repression and social reform. The extent of the reforms should not be underestimated. As was the case in Iran under the last shah, though, the emergence of a more literate and more prosperous population was not accompanied by a corresponding increase in opportunities for political organization or free intellectual expression. Syria and Iraq were ruled by authoritarian dictators backed by the power of the Ba‘th Party, the armed forces, and networks of internal security agencies. These were the institutions Hafiz al-Asad and Saddam Husayn had manipulated as they rose from impoverished peasants to national presidents, and they continued to rely on them for the perpetuation of their rule.

PART SIX

CHALLENGES TO THE EXISTING ORDER

The Middle East in the 1990s and 2000s

From 1987 to 1991, a series of internal crises and external interventions rocked the Middle East and had momentous consequences for the future. The 1987 Palestinian uprising against the Israeli occupation led to the growing centrality of the Palestinian-Israeli conflict as a factor shaping regional affairs. In 1991, the massive armed response to Saddam Husayn's annexation of Kuwait left Iraq devastated and the United States standing alone as the hegemonic power in the Middle East. Meanwhile, popular disaffection with ruling elites spread throughout the region. In Turkey and Lebanon, this discontent found expression in the growth of Islamist political movements and their relative electoral advances. In Iran, dissatisfaction with the ulama's rule led to an increasing desire for more pluralism, especially among youth, followed by conservative forces' determination to retake control.

In 1987, the Palestinians of the West Bank and Gaza launched a mass uprising, called the intifada, against the Israeli occupation. The uprising continued for four years and focused world attention on the harsh realities of the Israeli occupation. It also galvanized the external PLO leadership into undertaking a series of diplomatic initiatives that eventually led to the first Oslo Accord in 1993 as well as Yasir Arafat's return to Palestine and his assumption of authority over a small portion of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. But the so-called peace process this agreement set in motion stalled in the second half of the 1990s and barely survived into the 2000s. Its failure has prompted increasing concern that the two-state solution to the Palestinian-Israeli conflict was vanishing altogether.

The end of the cold war and the abrupt reduction of Soviet power offered the United States an opportunity to achieve unprecedented influence in the region. Evidence of the United States' unrivaled post–cold war influence was most striking in the Gulf War of 1991 and its aftermath. With American dominance unrivaled, the question of how the United States would conduct relations with Iraq and Iran became critical. The defining moment of American foreign policy during this period was when, in 2003, the United States toppled Saddam Husayn's regime. Intended as a massive show of American power following the shock of the September 11, 2001, attacks by al-Qa‘ida, the invasion and occupation of Iraq instead drained American foreign policy of credibility and resources. From the ruins of postoccupation Iraq emerged a new splinter group of al-Qa‘ida, the Islamic State of Iraq and al-Sham (ISIS), that sought to entrench itself as a self-proclaimed state on territory in both Iraq and Syria. Iran, meanwhile, steadily increased its nuclear program during a period of mutual escalation with the United States that lasted until 2013.

The uprisings that swept across North Africa in 2011 were momentous events, but they will take years to work themselves out. Clearly, any attempt to interpret the recent history of the Middle East runs the risk of being overtaken by rapidly changing events. Trends that appear to be of major significance at one moment can quickly be rendered peripheral by new and unexpected occurrences. But even if it is too soon at this writing to offer analytic reflection on the long-term direction of these events, their immediate impact has been enormous, and it is important to locate them as part of the historical legacy discussed in the preceding chapters: the dismemberment of the Ottoman Empire by European powers; the creation of new Arab states separated by colonial borders; the impact of foreign intervention on diplomatic alignments and the distribution of resources; and the failure of postindependence leaders to build inclusive states within those borders and to meet the growing populations' socioeconomic demands.

CHAPTER 22

THE PALESTINIAN INTIFADA AND THE 1991 GULF WAR

The 1987 intifada and the 1991 Gulf War were momentous events for the entire region. The Palestinian inhabitants of the West Bank and Gaza Strip participated in a mass uprising to bring an end to the Israeli occupation and establish an independent Palestinian state. The uprising, called the intifada, endured for nearly five years and forced Israel to recognize the impact of occupation on the Palestinians. A second internal regional crisis occurred in 1990 with the Iraqi invasion and annexation of Kuwait. This crisis quickly became internationalized into the Gulf War, which saw the armed forces of a US-led coalition devastate Iraq. A fundamental change in the international balance of power, a result of the end of the cold war and the collapse of the Soviet Union, made uncontested US military intervention in the Middle East possible. In the aftermath of the Gulf War, the enforcement of tough economic sanctions and the occasional US aerial bombardment continued to cripple Iraq. The war also had a lingering impact on Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, bringing the policies and behavior of the ruling families under closer scrutiny and unleashing demands for a greater degree of openness in the decision-making processes of the two states.

THE INTIFADA FROM 1987 TO 1991

Israeli Politics and the Occupied Territories

During the decade following the ill-conceived invasion of Lebanon in 1982, Israeli society experienced a polarization that was reflected in the fragmentation of the country's political life. In the 1984 and 1988 elections, numerous small parties at both extremes of the political spectrum attracted enough voters to deny the two main political groupings, Labor and Likud, the opportunity to form governments. The two parties were therefore forced to govern together in what was optimistically called a National Unity government but was in reality political paralysis.

The different positions Labor and Likud held in regard to the occupied territories divided the National Unity governments. The Labor Party favored territorial compromise, whereas Likud was adamantly opposed to relinquishing any portion of the Gaza Strip or the West Bank. Likud's position was forcefully represented by its leader, Yitzhak Shamir, who served as Israel's prime minister from 1986 to 1992. Born in Poland in 1915, Shamir immigrated to Palestine at the age of twenty and was quickly attracted to Jabotinsky's maximalist version of Zionism. He joined the Irgun in 1937 and later became one of the leaders of the Stern Gang, a terrorist organization responsible for carrying out attacks on Palestinians and British officials. Like his Likud predecessor, Menachem Begin, Shamir believed that all the lands of biblical Israel should be incorporated into the Jewish state. As prime minister, he intensified the construction of Israeli settlements in the West Bank and Gaza Strip and committed the government to a policy of incorporating the territories into Israel.

In addition to constructing new settlements, the Likud-dominated governments of the 1980s adopted measures designed to isolate and subjugate the Palestinian inhabitants. The Israeli state stepped up its practice of confiscating plots of Arab land, and the Israeli security services deported an increasing number of suspected political activists. Administrative detention, which permitted Palestinians to be arrested without a warrant and held for up to six months without being charged, was employed with greater frequency. The occupation intruded on Palestinians' daily lives in countless ways: They were required to carry identity cards and pay special taxes, they had to overcome a maze of bureaucratic obstacles and security checks to obtain the most basic licenses and business permits, and the Israeli authorities arrested, imprisoned, and sometimes tortured them for the slightest suspicion of political activism. One Palestinian academic explained the cumulative effect of Likud's policies as follows: "The denial of natural rights and more harsh treatment caused eventually an awareness that 'we are occupied.' Everyone felt threatened. Your national existence was targeted. This realization finally sunk into the consciousness of Palestinians, so the occupation was resisted."¹ The resistance took the form of a sustained popular uprising that was both a rejection of the Israeli occupation and an affirmation of the Palestinian people's right to national self-determination.

The Localized Beginnings

The Palestinian uprising, or intifada, began in Gaza on December 9, 1987, following a road accident involving an Israeli military vehicle that killed four Palestinians and injured several others. Thousands of Palestinians gathered to protest the incident, and when the Israeli army shot and killed some of the demonstrators, all of Gaza burst into open revolt. Within a few days, the West Bank was also engulfed in the uprising, as thousands of demonstrators carrying stones, slingshots, and gasoline bombs confronted the Israeli armed forces.

During its first few weeks, the intifada—which means a “shaking off”—was a spontaneous rebellion fueled by the anger of the discontented young people of the occupied territories. As the movement gathered momentum, however, it broadened to include all strata of Palestinian society, and an underground local leadership endeavored to coordinate the uprising. The Unified National Leadership (UNL), as it came to be known, was composed of a small group of individuals representing the major local factions of the PLO. Beginning in January 1988, the UNL issued sequentially numbered leaflets containing instructions for protest activities ranging from general strikes to street demonstrations. The discipline with which the Palestinians carried out the UNL's instructions revealed the measure of their support for the leaders and their determination to continue the uprising.

The intifada's objectives were contained in a fourteen-point program drawn up by a group of prominent Palestinians and endorsed by the UNL. The program demanded that Israel stop building settlements and confiscating Arab lands and that it cancel the special taxes and restrictions that applied only to Palestinians. In addition, the program called upon Israel to recognize an independent Palestinian state under the leadership of the PLO. To achieve these goals, the intifada leaders employed tactics designed to make the continued occupation a financial burden for Israel. Thus, during the first three years of the uprising, Palestinians engaged in a campaign of civil disobedience that included general strikes, shop closures, and a refusal to pay Israeli taxes. In addition, Palestinians attempted to make the Gaza Strip and the West Bank economically self-sufficient by boycotting Israeli goods and relying as much as possible on homegrown produce and locally manufactured goods. The violence that was an integral part of the civil disobedience consisted mainly of mass demonstrations and stone throwing. The Palestinians made a conscious decision at the beginning of the uprising to disavow the use of guns and knives. But as the intifada dragged on into the early 1990s, stabbings and shootings became more widespread. Israelis were not the only targets of the intifada; Palestinians who worked for Israel as informants were also singled out for revenge. Underground tribunals sentenced dozens of Palestinian collaborators to death, and local villagers beat and murdered many more.

As the uprising gained momentum, new organizations formed as rivals of the UNL, the most significant of which was the Islamic Resistance Movement, known widely by its Arabic acronym, Hamas. An offshoot of the Gaza branch of the Muslim Brotherhood, Hamas came into existence in 1988. Its leadership was dominated by young, university-educated individuals, mainly of refugee camp origin, who represented a new, socially mobilized stratum of Palestinian society. They challenged the local PLO-oriented UNL, which contained a significant element of established notable families, for control of the uprising and for the loyalties of the Palestinians participating in it.

In contrast to the PLO, with its secular nationalism, Hamas framed its program and its call to action in Islamic terms. In its charter of 1988, Hamas referred to itself as a Palestinian resistance movement that takes Islam as a way of life. The charter sacralized the land of Palestine, defining it as an Islamic waqf, no part of which could be abandoned or conceded. This definition made it impossible for Hamas to accept the two-state solution gradually endorsed by the PLO. Working through such grassroots organizations as charitable societies, Islamic and secular educational institutions, and a network of mosques under its control, Hamas emerged in the early 1990s as a viable political alternative to the local PLO. Its support base, originally centered in Gaza, expanded to the West Bank during the latter part of the decade.

The Israeli government made a determined effort to crush the uprising. The violence of the youthful stone throwers was met by the violence of the well-armed Israeli military. Television images of Israeli troops shooting at unarmed teenagers contributed to mounting criticism of the Israeli government both at home and abroad. The military also employed collective punishment on a broad scale, demolishing the homes of suspected stone throwers, placing entire villages under twenty-four-hour curfew for several days at a time, cutting off water and electricity, and closing the West Bank schools and universities. In an effort to undermine the Palestinians' efforts to gain economic self-sufficiency, Israeli troops and settlers uprooted fruit and olive trees and destroyed private vegetable gardens. However, according to Robert Hunter, Israel's use of collective punishment only caused participation in the intifada to increase.² Israeli retaliation affected all Palestinians in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank and led Palestinian society to unite in common opposition to the occupation. But opposition had a price: By the end of 1990, the uprising had cost the lives of an estimated 1,025 Palestinians, including 250 alleged collaborators killed by the forces of the uprising as well as 56 Israelis. More than 37,000 Arabs had been wounded and between 35,000 and 40,000 arrested. It was at this point—late 1990—that the intensity of the uprising began to diminish. Although it continued sporadically until spring 1992, the cooperation among all segments of Palestinian society that had sustained the intifada for its first two years started to evaporate in the face of Israeli countermeasures and internal divisions among Palestinians.

The International Dimension of the Intifada

The intifada began as a purely local Palestinian response to unbearable local conditions and was not inspired by the external PLO leadership in Tunis. Indeed, the intifada was an expression of dissatisfaction by the Palestinians of the West Bank and Gaza Strip with the PLO and its chairman, Yasir Arafat. To the Palestinians living under occupation, the PLO of the 1980s appeared to be more concerned with exile politics than with their plight. Yet no matter how disillusioned the Palestinians in the territories may have been with the PLO, they continued to regard it as their legitimate representative to the international community. Once the uprising began, links were forged between the external PLO and the occupied territories, and Arafat embarked on a new round of diplomacy.

Arafat recognized that in order for an independent Palestinian state to exist, Israel would have to abandon its hope of annexing the occupied territories. The only outside power capable of persuading Israel to modify its policies and enter into negotiations was the United States. However, the United States would not exercise its influence in this matter until the PLO recognized the state of Israel, something it had steadfastly refused to do. Under pressure to act on behalf of the Palestinians of the intifada, Arafat worked successfully to change the PLO's position. In fall 1988, he made a historic announcement that contained the following major points: The PLO accepted Israel's right to exist as a state; the PLO renounced the use of terrorism and agreed that UN Resolutions 242 and 338 should serve as the basis for an international peace conference; and the PLO proclaimed an independent Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza Strip with East Jerusalem as its capital. Arafat's program represented the so-called two-state compromise: The PLO dropped its earlier insistence that all of Palestine should be liberated and acknowledged Israel's right to exist within its pre-1967 borders.

Arafat's compromise ushered in a series of US-PLO negotiations conducted through the US embassy in Tunis. The purpose of the discussions was to establish a basis for the entry of the United States into the peace process as a mediator between Israel and the PLO. However, the refusal of Prime Minister Shamir's government to consider any change in the status of the occupied territories undermined the efforts. This phase of US-PLO relations collapsed completely when a splinter group within the PLO tried to mount a raid into Israel, thus calling into question the sincerity of Arafat's renunciation of terrorism. US President George H. W. Bush, bowing to domestic pressure from Israel's supporters, broke off negotiations with the PLO in 1990.

Arafat's diplomacy in support of the intifada had failed miserably. Counting on the United States' ability to influence Israel, he had recognized Israel's right to exist without receiving any concessions in return. Abandoned by Washington in summer 1990, Arafat made the fateful decision to associate the PLO with Saddam Husayn's Iraqi regime.

THE GULF CRISIS OF 1990–1991

Iraq's Invasion of Kuwait and the US-Led Response

On August 2, 1990, the armed forces of Iraq invaded Kuwait; six days later, the Iraqi government announced that Kuwait had been annexed as the nineteenth province of Iraq. These actions precipitated an international crisis that culminated in the US-led Gulf War against Iraq in January and February 1991. The immediate effects of that war were strikingly evident: the devastation of Iraq, the creation of a monumental refugee problem, and the emergence of the United States as an uncontested superpower in the Middle East.

The crisis that led to the Gulf War was regional in nature and unfolded against the backdrop of the developments discussed earlier in this chapter. The failure of the Palestinian intifada to bring about a change in Israel's relentless settlement policy, the impending immigration of hundreds of thousands of Soviet Jews to Israel, the collapse of the Soviet Union, and the emergence of the United States—ally of Israel—as the sole superpower all combined to create an atmosphere of frustration and uncertainty within the Arab world. In these circumstances, the aggressive propaganda campaign Saddam Husayn launched against Israel and the United States in early 1990 found a receptive Arab audience and enhanced the Iraqi leader's prestige as the only national leader who unequivocally championed the Palestinian cause. Husayn warned that Iraq would retaliate against any Israeli attack on an Arab state and turn Israel into an inferno. These challenges to Israeli intransigence in the occupied territories were welcome in many quarters of the Arab world, especially among the Palestinians, and enhanced Iraq's standing within Arab circles opposed to the status quo.

To the rising Iraqi-Israeli tensions were added the specific disputes between Iraq and Kuwait, some of them of long-standing, others of more recent origin. The most enduring disagreement was caused by Iraq's refusal to recognize the legitimacy of the border dividing the two states. When British officials defined the Iraq-Kuwait border in 1923, they gave Kuwait more territory in the north than the Kuwaiti rulers traditionally controlled. This was not a reward to Kuwait but rather a deliberate British attempt to restrict Iraq's access to the Persian Gulf (see Chapter 11). Deprived of the opportunity to construct deep-water ports, Iraq was forced to rely on the port of Basra, which was located over fifty miles (eighty kilometers) inland up the tortuous and much-disputed Shatt al-Arab waterway. Beginning with the reign of Faysal I, Iraqi governments disputed the border and refused to recognize the existence of the state of Kuwait until 1963. Even then, Iraq did not acknowledge the permanence of the British-drawn border, and official Iraqi propaganda continued to maintain that Kuwait was a part of the province of Basra.

Immediate economic and strategic considerations also played a role in Husayn's decision to annex Kuwait in summer 1990. The costly conflict with Iran had left Iraq with an enormous burden of debt, some $60 billion of which was owed to Kuwait and Saudi Arabia (see Chapter 21). Iraq constantly pressured Kuwait to forgive the debt, claiming that the Iraqi "defense" of the Arab Gulf states against Iran was an act of sacrifice in the name of Arab brotherhood. Iraq also accused Kuwait of extracting more than its share of oil from the Rumeila oil field, a petroleum deposit that straddled the border between the two states. According to Iraq's charges, Kuwait had been wrongfully exploiting the Rumeila field since 1980 and had "stolen" $2.4 billion worth of Iraqi oil. The most significant point of contention between the two countries was oil production. Iraq was dependent on oil revenues to finance its postwar recovery and its military buildup and therefore favored setting oil prices at the highest possible level. Each member of OPEC was assigned a production quota designed to maintain the price of oil at $18 a barrel. However, Kuwait and the UAE persisted in exceeding their assigned quotas, and Iraq and other oil producers accused them of flooding the market and causing a drop in the price of oil. Iraq's foreign minister pointed out that every $1 per barrel drop in the price of oil cost Iraq $1 billion in annual revenues. With the price of oil hovering around $12 per barrel in 1990, Iraq put tremendous pressure on Kuwait to abide by its OPEC production quota. In a skillfully waged propaganda war, the Iraqi regime placed Kuwait's oil policies within the context of the Arab-Israeli conflict. Iraqi spokesmen pointed out that the only beneficiaries of low oil prices were the Western consumer nations and Kuwait itself, which earned more from its investments in the Western economies than it did from petroleum. Kuwait was thus portrayed as a traitor state, a willing participant in the US-Israeli alliance directed against Iraq's economic recovery and the entire Arab nation's welfare.

And, finally, the destruction of the port of Basra and the blocking of the Shatt al-Arab waterway during the war with Iran left Iraq virtually landlocked and forced the country to rely on pipelines through Turkey and Saudi Arabia for exporting its oil. Pipelines were an uncertain means of export because the states through which they passed could shut them down at any time. Iraqi leaders were convinced that the future economic well-being of their country depended upon the acquisition of territory suitable for the construction of deep-water port facilities, and they contended that Kuwait's long-standing refusal to cede one of its offshore islands to Iraq for use as a port was but another example of the Kuwaiti royal family's support of US imperialism.

In July 1990, Kuwait acknowledged that it had been overproducing oil and agreed to abide by the OPEC quota. Nevertheless, Baghdad claimed that Kuwait's overproduction, its use of the Rumeila oil field, and its refusal to cancel Iraq's debts amounted to economic warfare against Iraq. The August 1990 invasion was, according to Baghdad, a justifiable retaliation. Annexing Kuwait promised to solve Iraq's most pressing economic problems: Access to the Gulf would be ensured, the debt to Kuwait would be terminated, and funds for reconstruction and military procurement would become abundantly available. In addition, Iraq and Kuwait together possessed 20 percent of the proven world oil reserves, a factor that alone would give the new, greater Iraq enormous influence within the petroleum industry. But Iraq was also a major military power, and that, in combination with its potential economic strength, placed it in a position to dominate the Persian Gulf and to shape the oil policies of the producing states.

When Husayn ordered his troops into Kuwait, he had little reason to anticipate an aggressive US response. Up to the eve of the invasion, the Bush administration courted Iraq, providing it with billions of dollars' worth of agricultural credits. However, Washington was horrified at the prospect of Husayn exercising control over the oil-producing Gulf and was quick to intervene after Iraq's occupation of Kuwait.

The first phase of the United States' military response was defensive; it was undertaken to protect Saudi Arabia from Iraqi aggression. Some policymakers thought at the time that Iraq's invasion of Kuwait was but a prelude to an attack on Saudi Arabia, and the Saudi armed forces, despite the billions of dollars the Saudis had spent on weapons, were no match for the larger and more experienced Iraqi military machine. The Saudi government therefore issued a formal invitation to the United States to send troops to defend the kingdom. Operation Desert Shield was set in motion, and by October 1990, over 200,000 US troops were stationed in Saudi Arabia.

In the meantime, the Bush administration set about building an international coalition against Iraq. Working through the UN Security Council, which played an especially active role in the crisis, the United States pushed through resolutions demanding Iraq's withdrawal from Kuwait and imposing a trade embargo on all goods to and from Iraq and Kuwait. Even the Soviet Union, in a demonstration of post–cold war diplomacy, joined in the international criticism of Iraq and suspended arms shipments to Baghdad. This skillful use of multilateral diplomacy would stand in marked contrast to US policies during the Iraqi crisis of 2002–2004.

In an attempt to limit Arab condemnation of its military intervention in Arabia, the United States sought to persuade Arab countries outside the Gulf to support Operation Desert Shield. The Arab response to the US diplomatic initiatives was divided. Egypt endorsed the intervention and sent troops to join the coalition. Syria, in a reversal of its long-standing anti-US policy, also agreed to participate in the operation. Both states were handsomely rewarded for their cooperation: The United States canceled $7 billion of Egypt's military debts, and Syria received generous loans from Saudi Arabia and the European community. However, one of Washington's most durable Arab allies, King Husayn of Jordan, condemned the intervention and refused to join the coalition. King Husayn's stance was largely determined by the pressure he felt from the Palestinian community that made up a majority of Jordan's population. Among the Palestinians, Saddam Husayn's defiance of the United States, Israel's most important ally, was popular. The PLO voted against the Arab League resolution condemning the Iraqi invasion, but as the crisis intensified, the organization tried to cover its diplomatic flanks and termed the invasion illegal.

Throughout the Arab world, the Gulf crisis generated anxiety and ambivalence. Although Iraq's occupation of Kuwait was generally condemned, the arrival of a major US military force to reverse the occupation was extremely unpopular. The US intervention tapped a deep source of Arab resentment that focused on the United States' double standard in the Middle East. Arabs noted that although Washington was quick to enforce UN resolutions against Iraq, it had not tried to compel Israel to obey UN resolutions pertaining to the West Bank and Gaza Strip. A reminder of the harshness of the Israeli occupation occurred on October 8, 1990, when Israeli police, in the bloodiest day of the intifada, responded to a Palestinian demonstration by killing twenty people and wounding scores of others. The Palestinians had been protesting plans by an Israeli fringe group to reclaim the Haram al-Sharif and to construct a Jewish temple on the site of Jerusalem's holiest Islamic shrines. The Temple Mount incident embarrassed the United States' Arab allies and provided Iraq with a potent propaganda weapon. Saddam Husayn drew a connection between the occupation of Kuwait and the Israeli occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip. As the crisis unfolded, the Iraqi president stated that Israel's withdrawal from the occupied territories was a necessary precondition for Iraq's evacuation of Kuwait. Although the United States denied that the two occupations were linked in any way, Saddam Husayn's tactics brought renewed attention to the Palestinian situation and to Washington's support of Israel.

The occupation of Kuwait also brought to the surface sentiments that were not entirely sympathetic to the Arab Gulf rulers. In the view of many Arabs, the Gulf states were unnatural entities whose borders and ruling families had been determined by Britain to serve British interests. As an Egyptian diplomat noted regarding the ambivalence Iraq's actions evoked, "The invasion is a black and white situation. We condemn it. But the reasons for the invasion are not so black and white."³ To many Arabs, it seemed unfair that the Gulf's ruling families should benefit from a geological quirk that gave them control of over 30 percent of the world's petroleum reserves. The families' personal fortunes, their ability to establish extensive social welfare systems, and their exclusion of foreign workers from citizenship aroused envy and resentment in other areas of the Arab world. From this perspective, Iraq's occupation of Kuwait represented a blow to the legacy of imperialism and a humbling of the arrogant Kuwaitis.

From Desert Shield to Desert Storm

By autumn 1990, the objectives of Operation Desert Shield had been achieved: The coalition forces stationed in Saudi Arabia were more than sufficient to protect the kingdom from invasion, and the UN-imposed economic sanctions were beginning to restrict Iraq's imports and exports. Under these circumstances, some US policymakers suggested that a peaceful resolution of the crisis could be attained by the continued enforcement of the sanctions, which, they argued, would create such economic hardships for Iraq that it would eventually be forced to adhere to the UN resolutions and withdraw from Kuwait. Others within the Washington establishment argued that the embargo was only moderately effective and that it would become even less so with the passage of time. The merits of the arguments presented on Capitol Hill mattered little—President Bush had already made the decision to go to war. In early November, he ordered US forces in Arabia to be doubled to 400,000 troops and announced the need for the coalition to develop an offensive military option. During the same month, the UN Security Council passed a resolution setting January 15, 1991, as the deadline for the complete withdrawal of Iraqi forces from Kuwait. The resolution authorized the "use of all necessary means" to enforce Iraq's pullout after January 15. The operation that had been mounted for the defense of Saudi Arabia was being transformed into an offensive campaign for the liberation of Kuwait. By January 1991, the number of US troops had risen to over 500,000, and Operation Desert Shield was poised to become Desert Storm.

The Bush administration justified its change of policy by emphasizing the moral responsibility of liberating Kuwait and of denying Iraq the fruits of its aggression. The administration also went to great lengths to portray Saddam Husayn as a source of evil whose crimes must not go unpunished. Bush's personalization of his animosity toward the Iraqi leader was reminiscent of British prime minister Eden's fixation on Nasser during the Suez Crisis of 1956. Bush compared the Iraqi president to Hitler and stressed the need to destroy his regime. The vilification of Husayn was so intense and the focus on him so concentrated that he, and he alone, was made out to be the embodiment of the Iraqi nation. By concentrating on the figure of Husayn, the US administration gained popular support for military action directed against a ruthless individual ruler without having to explain the possible impact of such a war on the people of Iraq.

Behind the rhetoric about the liberation of Kuwait and the cruelty of Husayn lay a more practical motive for military action. The rulers of the Arab Gulf states provided the United States and Europe with dependable access to reasonably priced oil. From the perspective of the Western oil-consuming nations, the stability of the Arab Gulf monarchies and their continued willingness to sell oil to the West were essential to Western economic well-being. Moreover, the Gulf rulers' practice of reinvesting their oil profits in the West was vital to the health of the Western economies. Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, and the UAE had combined investments in the West totaling between $200 billion and $300 billion. US interests were well served by the existing economic and political order in the Gulf; Husayn's Iraq posed a threat to that order. For example, in a speech delivered in early 1990, Husayn called upon the Arab states to reinvest their oil profits in Arab economies, not in foreign ones. With the Iraqi annexation of Kuwait, it was possible that Kuwait's investments would be redirected, that Kuwait's oil would be withheld from the market to achieve political concessions from the West, and that other oil-producing Gulf states might be persuaded to reconsider their accommodating policies toward the Western consuming nations. The US administration could not allow Iraq to disrupt the favorable existing order.

The UN deadline of January 15, 1991, passed without an Iraqi withdrawal from Kuwait. On January 16, the air war against Iraq began. For forty-two consecutive days and nights, the coalition forces subjected Iraq to the most intensive air bombardment in military history. Although the bombing campaign concentrated primarily on military targets, it also destroyed facilities on which civilian life depended—power-generating plants, communications centers, water mains, highways, bridges, and railroads. The entire infrastructure of Iraq was rendered inoperable. Iraqi forces in Kuwait were also heavily bombed, and the resulting damage to Kuwaiti installations was extensive.

Iraq was virtually defenseless against the bombing. Its air defenses were put out of action early in the campaign, and its air force was not ordered into combat. In these circumstances, the regime resorted to a tactic designed to broaden the war and cause confusion among the coalition members. Iraq launched over thirty Scud missiles at Israel, twelve of which landed in downtown Haifa and Tel Aviv. At the time, it was feared that the missiles were armed with poison chemicals, and the Israeli government issued gas masks to all its citizens—but not to the Palestinians in the occupied territories—and urged them to remain indoors for long periods of time. The specter of the inhabitants of the Jewish state becoming the victims of chemical warfare was a chilling one and resurrected memories of the Holocaust. However, the Iraqi missiles were armed with conventional warheads and caused little material damage in Israel. But the attacks did threaten the cohesion of the coalition so painstakingly constructed by the United States. If Israel chose to retaliate against Iraq, it was likely that the Arab partners in the coalition would withdraw because they could not allow themselves to be part of a US-Israeli alliance against an Arab state. Israel did not normally remain passive when threatened by its Arab enemies, and an attack of this psychological magnitude seemed sure to generate a swift military response. But in this instance, the United States successfully persuaded the Israeli government to keep its air force out of the conflict.

Throughout the relentless bombing campaign, US military commanders repeatedly warned that Iraq remained well armed. The ground war to retake Kuwait was launched on February 24 and lasted only 100 hours. Evidence released after the war revealed that US reports grossly inflated the Iraqi military's size and abilities in order to justify the massive force deployed against Iraq. The Iraqi conscript troops who had managed to survive the bombings were poorly supplied and thoroughly demoralized. When the coalition forces entered Kuwait, the Iraqi army began a disorderly retreat back across the border toward Basra. The ground war quickly became a rout: Thousands of Iraqi soldiers surrendered and thousands more were killed by US aircraft in scenes of horrible carnage along the road to Basra, known to the survivors as “the highway of death.” According to the correspondent of the London Observer, the assault was so severe that it constituted “one of the most terrible harassments of a retreating army from the air in the history of warfare.”⁴ On February 27, 1991, Bush proclaimed the liberation of Kuwait and ordered the US and coalition forces to suspend offensive operations. The president’s decision to halt Operation Desert Storm without ensuring the overthrow of Saddam Husayn and his regime became the subject of much controversy in the years that followed.

The Uprisings

The cease-fire did not end the agony of the Iraqi people. In a spontaneous outburst of anger and resentment, segments of the Iraqi population rose up against the regime that had led the country into two devastating wars. The rebellion began in the Shi‘a south and soon spread to the Kurds in the north. In both regions, the uprisings experienced early successes that were followed by crushing defeats.

In the south, the rebellion was triggered by the retreating soldiers, who felt that the government had abandoned them once Operation Desert Storm was launched. Civilian opponents of the government joined the disaffected troops, and this combination of forces took control of most of the southern cities, including Basra and the holy Shi‘a shrines of Karbala and Najaf, during the first two weeks of March 1991. Although the revolt had Shi‘a overtones, it did not represent a movement among the Shi‘a for union with Iran; rather, it was a rejection of the regime and the hardships to which Husayn’s disastrous policies had subjected southern Iraq’s inhabitants. In town after town, demonstrators attacked the Ba‘th Party buildings, the offices of the Ba‘th-appointed mayors, and the headquarters of the secret police. Mass revenge killings of Ba'thist officials occurred throughout the course of the uprising.

Because the uprising in the south was spontaneous, it lacked organization, leadership, and objectives. In the chaotic circumstances of a true popular rebellion, the rebel forces in one town were usually unaware of events in neighboring towns. This lack of coordination facilitated the government's efforts to put down the uprising. Although the Iraqi army had been battered, it remained far stronger than the poorly armed civilian rebels, and although elements of the army participated in the rebellion, substantial units remained loyal to the regime. By the end of March, the Iraqi military had crushed the rebellion and begun the mass executions of rebels.

A similar scenario unfolded in the Kurdish territories of northern Iraq. Aware of the enormity of the army's defeat in Kuwait and of the spread of the rebellion in the south, Kurdish leaders decided that this was the opportune moment to seize the autonomy for which they had so frequently struggled. During a two-week period in March, Kurdish forces took control of the major cities and towns in the north. More experienced and better organized than the southern rebels, the Kurds set up municipal administrations in the captured cities and enunciated a program that had wide appeal: democracy for Iraq and autonomy for Kurdistan. However, when the Iraqi army turned its attention from the south to the north, the Kurdish rebellion disintegrated.

At the approach of the regular army, the Kurdish fighters retreated to the mountains. This induced panic among the unprotected civilian population, and they began to flee their towns and villages. The flight became a mass exodus as an estimated 2 million Kurds headed toward the Turkish and Iranian borders. The oft-stated reason for the Kurds' flight was their fear of extermination at the hands of a regime that had used poison gas against the Kurdish town of Halabja in 1988 (see Chapter 21). The Kurdish flight constituted another tragedy of the Gulf War: The harsh mountain climate trapped hundreds of thousands of Kurdish refugees, living in makeshift camps and surviving on the meager supplies provided by overstretched international relief agencies. At least 20,000 refugees, mainly infants, children, and the elderly, perished. In May 1991, US and European troops entered northern Iraq and established "safe-haven" zones to which the Kurds could return under foreign protection. However, the majority of the Kurdish refugees were so fearful of reprisals from the regime that they remained in the camps for months.

The Formal Cease-fire Document

On April 3, 1991, after more than a month of negotiations, the UN Security Council adopted Resolution 687 setting forth the terms for a formal cease-fire in the Gulf War. Iraq officially accepted the terms on April 6. Part of the lengthy and complex resolution sought to reduce Iraq's military capabilities by requiring Baghdad to destroy all its chemical and biological weapons as well as its ballistic missiles. UN inspection units working in cooperation with the International Atomic Energy Agency would carry out the inspection of Iraq's armament factories and the supervision of the destruction of the banned weapons.

The cease-fire resolution also punished Iraq for the invasion of Kuwait and attempted to prevent its recurrence. Iraq was required to return property stolen from Kuwait during the occupation and to contribute to a fund created to pay compensation for war damage claims against the Iraqi government. In addition, both Iraq and Kuwait had to accept any modifications in the boundary between them that might be proposed by a new UN commission. The commission's report, delivered in 1993, was punitive toward Iraq. It moved Kuwait's boundary 570 meters north, thus giving Kuwait possession of six additional wells in the Rumeila oil field and portions of the Iraqi naval base at Umm Qasr. Iraq recognized the new border and also acknowledged the sovereign independence of the Kuwaiti state, thus abandoning the historical claims dating to the late Ottoman period. In addition to the restrictions in the cease-fire document, the United States and its allies took steps to prevent a recurrence of Iraqi attacks on the Kurds and the Shi'a. In April 1991, Iraq was ordered not to fly any aircraft north of the thirty-sixth parallel, and in August 1992, the same prohibition was put in place for all flights south of the thirty-second parallel. Although Iraq insisted that the no-fly zones constituted an infringement on its sovereignty and from time to time tested the allies' resolve to enforce them, the constant presence of allied air patrols in the zones effectively deterred the regime from carrying out air attacks against the Kurds and the Shi'a.

And, finally, the cease-fire resolution stipulated that if Iraq handed over all its weapons of mass destruction and its nuclear, biological, and chemical materials to the UN inspection unit by mid-May 1991, then the ban on Iraqi exports, including oil, would also be lifted. These terms were important: They defined the actions Iraq had to take in order to begin earning the petroleum revenue that was vital for reconstructing the country's devastated infrastructure. If Iraq did not take the required actions, the UN Security Council could maintain the economic sanctions.

THE AFTERMATH OF THE GULF WAR

An experienced observer of Middle Eastern affairs places the Gulf War's impact in its regional and global contexts, noting,

This war has been an unmitigated disaster for millions of people in the Middle East and beyond. The many tens of thousands killed, the billions of dollars of property destruction, the millions of displaced persons and disrupted lives, the uncounted thousands with permanent physical and psychological scars, and the badly damaged economies are far more devastating than anything that has happened in the region in this century. . . . The political, social and economic consequences of the U.S. assault on Iraq, and the Iraqi regime's consequent assault on its own people, will afflict the region and the world well into the next century.⁵

In the wake of the US invasion of Iraq in 2003, this dark prediction was well on its way to fulfillment. As the following sections will show, the impact of the Gulf War on the Middle Eastern states and peoples it most directly affected during the decade following the conflict profoundly altered the economic and political status quo and inflicted unanticipated levels of disease, death, and poverty on the people of Iraq.

Iraq: The Prolonged Postwar Period

The loss of life in Iraq will probably never be known for certain. Estimates range from no more than 10,000 to 100,000 individuals. The higher numbers seem more realistic, and it is likely that at least 82,000 Iraqi soldiers and 7,000 civilians were killed in the air and ground wars. By contrast, the coalition lost 139 soldiers in combat, 79 of whom were Americans. An additional 6,000 Iraqis were killed during the uprising in the south, and over 20,000 Kurds died from exposure and disease during their flight.

Despite the hardships that his decisions had inflicted on the population of Iraq, Saddam Husayn remained defiant in the face of the UN cease-fire resolution and US threats to resume the conflict. The UN weapons inspection units, known as the United Nations Special Commission on Disarmament (UNSCOM), revealed the immensity of Iraq's chemical production and nuclear research programs and discovered that the country was much closer to achieving nuclear capability than had previously been thought. The regime resented the presence of the UN personnel, and until late 1998, Iraqi authorities practiced deception and engaged in a series of confrontations with the inspection units, refusing to allow them access to several of the sites they wished to examine. Although tons of Iraq's conventional and chemical military arsenal were destroyed, the Security Council in general and the United States in particular remained convinced that the regime was successfully concealing large quantities of its chemical and biological stores and the laboratories that produced them. Because of the combination of Iraqi deceit and US suspicions, the Security Council determined that the regime had not complied with the terms of the cease-fire and therefore refused to lift the trade embargo. The only imports permitted into Iraq were food, medicine, and other items classified as humanitarian aid.

Finally, in 1996, an oil-for-food agreement was reached that allowed Iraq to sell $2 billion worth of oil every six months (the amount was raised to $5.8 billion in 1998 and to $8.3 billion in 1999) in order to purchase humanitarian supplies. However, Iraq's control over the proceeds was severely restricted. They were placed in a UN-controlled bank account and distributed first to meet Iraq's cease-fire obligations. Thus, 30 percent of the funds from the sales were used to pay Iraq's war reparations, another amount was designated for humanitarian supplies for the Kurds in the north, and still more was used to pay for UN operations in Iraq. By the time the Security Council had parceled out these funds, the amount remaining to alleviate the suffering of the Iraqi people was pitifully inadequate. Moreover, Saddam Husayn was able to monopolize a portion of the imports and direct them to favored members of his patronage network. Society's most destitute received no benefits from a system designed first and foremost to ensure the regime's survival.

The effects of the prolonged sanctions on the people of Iraq were devastating. During the war, the coalition's bombs had destroyed or disabled virtually the entire civilian infrastructure of the country. Water purification plants, sewage treatment systems, electrical power stations, and irrigation systems were all either in ruins or functioning at only a fraction of their full capacity. Although the bridges and government buildings in Baghdad were rapidly rebuilt and essential services were sufficiently restored to enable the city to function, the sanctions continued to have disastrous effects. Because of a shortage of basic medical supplies and foodstuffs, malnutrition and disease, especially among children, increased throughout the country. Reports from UN agencies showed that child mortality had increased fivefold in the years from 1991 to 1996. Of particular concern was the health risk posed by the inadequate water treatment plants and sewage systems. The water purification system was not restored to its prewar capacity and lacked sufficient supplies of chlorine, which Iraq was forbidden to import because it was regarded as a chemical agent with potential military use. Sewage plants ceased chemical treatments completely and dumped raw sewage into the Tigris and Euphrates rivers. The contaminated water supply was responsible for much of the disease that ravaged Iraq's child population. Food shortages were another basic problem, and the population was kept alive only by a tightly managed government food-rationing program.

Rampant inflation and currency devaluation reduced Iraq's once-formidable middle class to poverty, and widespread unemployment contributed to a rise in crime and prostitution. Iraq's isolation deprived its professional classes of access to publications from outside the country and denied the country's emerging generation any familiarity with computers, the Internet, or satellite television. The humanitarian disaster created by the sanctions prompted some Western critics to question the morality of the collective punishment that was being inflicted upon Iraqi civilians and to doubt the logic behind the policy of holding “the welfare of a nation hostage to the good behavior of a dictator.”⁶

Despite rumors of attempted coups and assassination plots, Saddam Husayn retained his firm grip on power. The ruthlessness with which he treated suspected opponents and the elaborate security measures with which he surrounded himself discouraged dissent within the ruling elite. Meanwhile, the population at large was more concerned with basic physical and economic survival than with a possible change in the regime. It has often been pointed out that in cases of economic embargo, the elite at whom the sanctions are directed are the least likely to suffer their effects. That was certainly the case in Iraq. While the population struggled to survive, lavish new presidential palaces sprouted in Baghdad and the countryside. A wealthy group of sanction busters within the elite, led by Husayn’s two sons, managed to smuggle oil out of the country and import expensive consumer items. They were noted for their conspicuous presence in Baghdad’s most expensive restaurants and nightclubs. The regime was totally unrepentant for the havoc wrought by its initiatives and was committed to staying in power at all costs.

Kuwait and Saudi Arabia: The Impact of the Decline in World Oil Prices

Before discussing the impact of the Gulf War on Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, we need to examine a trend that began before the war but that would have a profound effect on the abilities of these two states to maintain political stability following it. The soaring oil prices of the 1970s peaked at $41 per barrel in 1982, then began a gradual decline that culminated in a crash in 1986, when the price fell to $10 per barrel. From 1986 to the late 1990s, prices remained at less than $20. This decline in oil prices affected all petroleum-producing countries, but it had a particularly devastating impact on the Gulf states, which were almost entirely dependent on oil revenues, and an even greater impact on Kuwait and Saudi Arabia because of their responsibilities for Gulf War-related costs that totaled nearly $100 billion.

As discussed in Chapter 20, the Gulf’s ruling families were able to enhance their power and retain their monopoly over the decision-making process because they could use enormous oil revenues to finance lavish social programs that bought popular loyalty and political quiescence. In the post–Gulf War situation, as populations grew and revenues declined, citizens of the Gulf states retained the expectations they had acquired during the twenty years of the oil boom—namely, that the state was responsible for providing them with a comfortable standard of living, free access to medical and educational facilities, and a host of other privileges. How could the ruling families of the Gulf keep their exclusive control of political power and economic resources if they were incapable of delivering the services their citizens had come to expect as a right? This question applied to all the Gulf monarchies, but it was particularly pressing in Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, where public criticism of the ruling families reached unprecedented levels in the postwar period.

Kuwait suffered severe damage from the Iraqi occupation and the coalition’s liberation. Iraqi troops looted the country during the occupation and wantonly destroyed hotels and public buildings. Iraq also practiced environmental warfare, loosing on the northern Persian Gulf two of the largest oil spills ever recorded. And on the eve of their retreat, Iraqi forces blew up 85 percent of Kuwait’s 950 oil wells, leaving them blazing infernos pouring acrid black smoke into the air. As the equivalent of 2 million barrels of oil a day burned, the sky above Kuwait darkened and the entire country was turned into an environmental catastrophe. Most of the fires were extinguished within a year, and oil production was restored to prewar capacity by 1993, much sooner than experts had predicted. But the expenses associated with the war and reconstruction were enormous. Kuwait paid between $16 billion and $20 billion as its share for the costs of Operation Desert Storm and spent an additional $65 billion on reconstruction. Because the country had received no oil revenues at all for two years, the only way it could finance these expenses was by liquidating some of the $100 billion it had invested abroad. Moreover, with oil income still down after 1992, the Kuwaiti government began to run a series of deficit budgets in order to maintain its social services. It made up the deficits by continuing to draw down its overseas investments, a practice that could not go on indefinitely.

The reputation and credibility of Kuwait’s ruling family suffered as a result of the war. While the Kuwaiti population was forced to endure occupation and warfare, the al-Sabah royal family passed the crisis in a luxury hotel in Saudi Arabia. Upon returning to Kuwait, the amir and his government appeared to give a higher priority to refurbishing the royal palace than to restoring essential services to the population at large. Beyond the ruling family's behavior during and after the war, deeper popular discontent centered on the regime's lack of accountability, especially for its mismanagement of Kuwait's oil and investment revenues. In 1992, financial scandals involving the loss of several billions of dollars were disclosed, and Kuwaitis were angered at the squandering of the revenues on which their social welfare system depended. In response to this combination of incompetence and insensitivity, the first weeks of the postwar era were marked by popular demonstrations for the establishment of democratic institutions. Although the al-Sabah family showed little understanding of the population's postwar expectations of greater participation in decision making, it finally bowed to pressure from within and from Washington and announced the restoration of the national assembly. Assembly elections were held in October 1992 and produced unexpected results. In a stunning rebuke of the royal family, the opposition captured thirty-five of the fifty seats in the assembly. The outcome of the election was all the more striking given that the electorate was still confined to the privileged few of Kuwaiti society—males over the age of twenty-one who could prove that their families had resided in the country before 1920.

The election results did not guarantee a smooth transition to democratic rule. Kuwait's new parliamentary era was stormy and marked by antagonism between Islamist and secularist deputies, leading, in turn, to legislative paralysis. New elections in 1996 produced another divisive assembly, prompting the amir to suspend parliament in 1999 and to schedule new elections for later in the year. During the suspension, the amir issued several decrees, most of them relating to basic budgetary matters that the deadlocked parliament had been unable to pass. However, one of the decrees had significant social and political implications—it granted women full citizenship rights. The 1999 elections again returned a majority of deputies opposed to the government and distrustful of its fiscal honesty and political integrity. In an alliance of opposites, Islamist deputies opposed to women's participation in politics and another group of representatives who objected to the amir's rule by decree garnered enough votes to overturn the amir's grant of citizenship rights to women.

Even with a national assembly dominated by opponents of the regime's policies, throughout the 1990s, the al-Sabah family retained its intimate identification with and control of the state. The crown prince continued to serve as prime minister, and members of the al-Sabah family held the key cabinet posts. However, in a departure from previous practice, six members of the assembly were brought into the cabinet, and government accountability was more closely monitored than it had been previously.

Saudi Arabia also felt the pressures of close scrutiny by the Western media, declining revenues and increasing expenditures, and criticism of its policies from segments of the population. The direct costs of the war for the Saudis have been estimated at $55 billion, a sum that was financed, as in Kuwait, by liquidating foreign investments. Because of its declining oil revenues, the kingdom had been running deficit budgets since the late 1980s. It continued to do so following the Gulf War, drawing down its reserves to dangerously low levels. Even so, the government could not maintain its social services at their prewar levels, nor could it provide the same degree of employment opportunities that it had previously.

The deteriorating economic situation, the continued presence of foreign troops on Saudi soil, and concerns about the government's financial management practices and its pro-Western orientation gave rise to protests from groups associated with liberal reform interests on one side and Islamist activists on the other. A liberal reformist group of businessmen and writers signed a petition in late 1990 requesting the establishment of a consultative council, greater freedom of the press, and a change in the status of women. This last issue was highlighted by a November 1990 incident that received wide coverage in the Western media, whose reporters were on hand to cover the Gulf crisis. Forty Saudi women, most of them teachers in women's schools, defied the existing convention prohibiting women from driving by forming a convoy of cars and driving them through the streets of Riyadh. The government, challenged by the Islamic establishment to take action, placed the women under house arrest, confiscated their passports, and released them from their jobs. Although they were later reinstated, their actions resulted in the government's turning what had been an unwritten social convention into a formal law banning women from driving and in presenting to the world an example of the exceptionally restrictive regulations governing women's roles in Saudi Arabia.

Islamists also presented a petition to the king requesting some of the same reforms that the secular-liberal group had, but they framed their demands in terms of the need to observe the shari‘ah and to grant the ulama a greater role in the decision-making process. Another faction of Islamic activists outside official ulama circles voiced their complaints much more forcefully. Composed of thousands of young middle-class urban dwellers worried about their future in the declining economy, these activists went further in accusing the government of failing to observe Islamic tenets. They claimed that by inviting Western troops to protect it, the royal family had shown its inability to defend the holy sites of Islam and that by continuing to rely on the presence of non-Muslim US troops after the war, the ruling house revealed its total dependence on the West. These activists also condemned the spread of Western cultural influences and demanded that the state cut its ties with the West and reshape its policies and practices to conform to Islamic guidelines. Among these Islamists was Osama bin Laden (see Chapter 25), whose public criticism of the regime’s failings led the government to withdraw his citizenship in 1994.

Under attack from both secularists and Islamists, King Fahd introduced new laws for the governing of the kingdom in March 1992. In the Basic Law of Government, the king reaffirmed the centrality of the House of Sa‘ud to the affairs of state. The law stated that monarchy was the form of Saudi government and that succession passed through the sons of Abd al-Aziz ibn Sa‘ud and their male descendants. The law also introduced sweeping changes in the process by which the king was chosen and expanded the pool of princes eligible for the throne, thus making it possible for one of the younger, foreign-educated princes to succeed Fahd. Notably absent from the Basic Law was any mention of civil or political rights or any suggestion that the government intended to address the question of the status of women. The Basic Law was not truly innovative and tended to reinforce the political and social status quo.

In a second measure, however, the king departed from tradition by authorizing the creation of the long-postponed consultative council (see Chapter 20). The council, which initially had sixty members, was empowered to provide advice to the king in several general areas. Because its deliberations and recommendations were confidential, it was impossible to know to what degree, if any, the council’s advice influenced the royal court or the policies of state. In 1997, King Fahd renewed the council's mandate and expanded it to ninety members. In one sense, the renewal and expansion of the council can be viewed as an exercise in royal co-optation designed to broaden the political base of the monarchy. But from another perspective, the king's decision to continue the consultative process may represent an evolutionary step in the Saudi political process.

The reforms did not placate the young Islamists, who continued to claim that affairs of state were not being conducted in accordance with true Islamic principles. In response, the ruling family insisted, as it always had, that the monarchy existed because it was Islamic and because it was guided in all matters by its adherence to Islam. This claim to Islamic legitimacy opened the door for critics to examine the degree to which Islam truly was the guiding principle of the regime. The Islamists found the regime wanting, and they questioned the legitimacy of the monarch with the same Islamic rhetoric the king used to defend it. This confrontation could not be easily resolved, but its resolution was central to the kingdom's ability to introduce peaceful change.

Yemen

Although Yemen was distant from the field of battle, peninsular rivalries ensnared that country in the demographic repercussions of the Gulf War. Throughout the 1980s, up to 1 million Yemeni workers were employed in Saudi Arabia; their remittances accounted for over 40 percent of the gross domestic products of both North and South Yemen. In May 1990, on the eve of Iraq's invasion of Kuwait, years of on-again, off-again negotiations between North and South Yemen culminated in the unification of the two states as the Republic of Yemen. The new state not only faced the usual problems generated by a merger, such as the allocation of cabinet portfolios and the integration of armed forces, but it also had to attempt to unify the socialist economy of the south with the free-market northern economy. Just as the newly unified state was coming to grips with these foundational issues, Iraq annexed Kuwait. Yemen attempted to remain neutral in the ensuing crisis, refusing to condemn the Iraqi invasion and withholding its support from the decision to send Arab forces to join the allied coalition.

This stance prompted Saudi Arabia to begin expelling Yemeni workers, and in the ensuing months, some 800,000 of them returned to Yemen. The Gulf states followed Saudi Arabia's example, expelling an additional 50,000 Yemeni workers. This put a severe strain on the resources of the Yemeni state; it had simultaneously experienced a sudden population increase of nearly 1 million people and a precipitous decline in revenues as the remittances came to a halt and the Gulf states canceled their financial assistance programs. Although its economy suffered badly, Yemen managed to provide for the returning workers.

However, its survival as a unified state came into question when a secessionist movement of southern politicians and military officers plunged the country into civil war in spring 1994. The brief but brutal conflict resulted in a military victory for forces from the north and the restoration of a fully unified Yemen, an outcome that the populations of both regions supported widely.

The Refugees

The invasion of Kuwait and the war that followed displaced hundreds of thousands of individuals and created a refugee problem of tragic proportions. A government's choice of ally during the crisis could directly affect the status of its citizens working within one of the neighboring countries. Egypt's decision to join the US-led coalition brought about the expulsion and flight of over 300,000 Egyptian workers from Iraq, and as we have seen in the section above, when Yemen chose not to endorse the coalition, Saudi Arabia expelled 800,000 Yemeni workers from the kingdom. The PLO's support of Iraq in the initial stages of the crisis had sobering repercussions for the organization itself as well as for Palestinians residing in the Arab Gulf states, especially in Kuwait. The PLO lost the subsidies it had previously received from the Kuwaiti and Saudi governments, and the Palestinians lost their homes and their livelihoods. Prior to the Iraqi invasion, Kuwait had been home to a relatively prosperous Palestinian community numbering around 400,000; by the time the war was over, most Palestinians had fled Kuwait, and those who remained were subject to harassment for allegedly cooperating with the Iraqi occupiers.

CONCLUSION

The grievances that sparked the intifada in 1987 were similar to those that produced the Palestinian rebellion of 1936–1939, even though the two events were separated by more than fifty years. Both uprisings represented sustained popular expressions of resentment over occupation and dispossession. The Palestinian Arabs of the late 1930s feared that continued Jewish settlement would lead to the loss of their lands and their expulsion from Palestine. Their rebellion did not prevent those fears from being realized. The Palestinian Arabs of the late 1980s feared that continued Jewish settlement in the West Bank and Gaza Strip would lead to the further loss of their lands and the extinction of Palestinian national identity in the only territories where Palestinians still constituted a majority. Their uprising was an attempt to gain freedom from the hardships of occupation and recognition for Palestinian national rights. Although it did not achieve its full objectives, the intifada succeeded in revealing, both to Palestinians themselves and to Israelis, the depth of Palestinian nationalism.

Iraq, the product of Britain's imperial map making, was born without any previous national identity. In determining the frontiers of Iraq, Britain intentionally limited the new state's access to the Persian Gulf to prevent it from challenging Britain's extensive interests there. For more than thirty years, successive Iraqi governments refused to recognize the existence of Kuwait, the state that blocked Iraq from the Gulf. Saddam Husayn's decision to invade Kuwait in 1990 was but the most extreme of several previous efforts by Iraqi governments to modify the restrictive frontier.

The huge scale of the coalition's response to the Iraqi invasion was unprecedented in the post–World War II era. When the war against Iraq began, President Bush expressed his hope that a new world order would emerge out of the conflict. But in effect, the United States and its coalition partners intervened in an inter-Arab crisis not to create a new world order but to prevent Iraq from overturning the existing economic and political order, from which the Western economies derived extensive benefits. US firepower annihilated the state that challenged the old order in the Middle East, whereas the ruling families that traditionally supported the existing system were rewarded with US protection. The awesome display of US military technology during the Gulf War, combined with the collapse of the Soviet Union, elevated the United States to unilateral hegemony in the Middle East. This development made those rulers who wished to preserve the existing order increasingly dependent on the United States.

CHAPTER 23

A PEACE SO NEAR, A PEACE SO FAR

Israeli-Palestinian Relations Since the 1991 Gulf War

In devoting a separate chapter to Palestinian-Israeli relations since the 1990s, we seek neither to reify nor to isolate this subject. The Palestinian-Israeli conflict was but one of several sources of regional instability during the period, and the launch of the Oslo peace process was far from the only major development in the Middle East of the 1990s. Nevertheless, the rise and fall of the peace process was a momentous occurrence and deserves the careful attention of historians of the modern Middle East. The first agreement in the process, known as Oslo I, was concluded in secret face-to-face meetings between Palestinian and Israeli officials, and its disclosure took the world by surprise. It set the stage for additional steps toward the normalization of relations between Israel and its Arab neighbors, the most important of which was a full treaty of peace and mutual recognition between Jordan and Israel. It led also to the return of Yasir Arafat to Palestine and his assumption of authority over a small portion of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

But Oslo I and the agreements that followed it produced darker moments as well. They contributed to the assassination of an Israeli prime minister by a Jewish Israeli citizen and thus exposed the deep divisions within Israeli society over the future direction of the state and its role in the occupied territories. They revealed similar divisions within Palestinian society as Arafat, a virtual outsider, sought to suppress local rivals, including the Hamas leadership, for control of the Palestinian minestate-in-the-making by transforming the democratic framework the Palestinians envisaged into an authoritarian apparatus controlled by his personal security forces. This chapter examines the key developments that opened up the possibilities of a peaceful settlement between Palestinians and Israelis but turned instead into a hostile impasse. In so doing, the chapter attempts to show the linkages between the intifada, the Gulf War, and the proposals for peace. The chapter also seeks to identify those currents within Palestinian and Israeli society that generated the early momentum for a peaceful settlement and those that contributed to the breakdown of negotiations.

THE ROAD TO THE OSLO PEACE ACCORDS

The Madrid Conference of 1991

The effect of the Palestinian intifada on Israeli society, the dominance of US power in the world, and the election of a Labor government in Israel formed part of a series of interconnected developments that contributed to a stunning breakthrough in Palestinian-Israeli relations. In the aftermath of the Gulf War, the George H. W. Bush administration embarked on an extensive effort to achieve a resolution of the Arab-Israeli conflict. Washington had doubtless promised its Arab coalition partners that it would address the issue once the war with Iraq was over. Moreover, the logic of Kuwait's liberation—that a people had the right to live free from occupation—offered a compelling reason to seek a settlement of the Israeli-Palestinian question.

The proposed instrument of conflict resolution was an international peace conference jointly sponsored by the United States and the Soviet Union, which opened in Madrid on October 30, 1991. In the short term, the Madrid Conference was more about public gestures than substantive discussions, and subsequent events have tended to relegate it to the background. However, the gathering at Madrid should not be overlooked; it was a significant step in bringing Israelis and Palestinians to a new level of contact. It brought together, for the first time, representatives from Israel and the neighboring Arab states that had not yet recognized Israel's right to exist—Jordan, Lebanon, and Syria—to discuss peace. And the negotiating sessions it set in motion conferred a sense of normalcy to the practice of Israeli and Palestinian spokespersons engaging in face-to-face meetings. The Madrid Conference also focused attention on the Palestinian delegation, which was composed of “insiders”—that is, Palestinians who lived and worked in the occupied territories. They presented their case with clarity and in tones of relative moderation and made the aging PLO exile leadership appear politically stale and out of touch with the realities of life in the occupied territories.

Between December 1991 and spring 1993, the Palestinian and Israeli delegations met several more times. In these post-Madrid meetings, the sticking point was, as it had been in all discussions since 1967, Israeli settlement policies in the occupied territories. But this time, the US administration adopted a firm stance against continued settlement activity.

In 1990, in the midst of the intifada and on the eve of the Gulf War, Israel embarked on the most ambitious program of settlement construction in the occupied territories it had yet undertaken. The settlement program continued during the Madrid conference and the subsequent peace talks. In the opinion of the Bush administration, Israel’s provocative actions in the occupied territories constituted the main obstacle to a successful outcome of the peace process. Israel’s refusal to heed US requests to freeze the settlements embroiled the two countries in a bitter dispute that finally drove President Bush to take a step that no US president before him had taken: linking US financial aid to Israel to Israel’s willingness to curb the settlements in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Although every US administration since 1967 had expressed its opposition to Israeli settlements in the occupied territories, Bush was the first to enforce that policy.

The US-Israeli dispute reached a climax in February 1992, when the United States announced that it would not approve a $10 billion loan guarantee to Israel unless Israel agreed to freeze construction of all settlements in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. Israel’s Prime Minister Shamir was defiant and insisted that his government would never back down in its determination to populate the occupied territories with Jewish settlers. Shamir’s uncompromising attitude caused the most serious strain in US-Israeli relations since Israel’s formation.

Despite Shamir's defiant rhetoric, Israel badly needed the US loan guarantee so it could borrow money on the international markets to help defray the costs of absorbing the new wave of Jewish immigration from the former Soviet Union. Israel planned to use the borrowed funds for housing construction and other measures required for the immigrants. Without the loans, Israel could not afford to finance its settlement policies in the occupied territories and at the same time prepare for the influx of Soviet immigrants.

All of the controversies associated with Shamir's government received intense public scrutiny during the buildup to Israel's national elections scheduled for June 1992. The elections pitted Shamir's Likud bloc against a Labor Party led by former prime minister Yitzhak Rabin. In a bitterly fought campaign, Shamir stressed Likud's commitment to Greater Israel, whereas Rabin expressed a vague but conciliatory position on the future of the occupied territories and pledged to restore friendly relations with the United States. The Israeli public rejected Shamir's ideological hard line and gave Rabin's Labor Party an overwhelming victory, bringing back to office the first Israeli prime minister to be born in Palestine. The election results created an intriguing historical irony: Twenty-five years after Rabin commanded the campaign that captured the West Bank and Gaza Strip as the Israeli army's chief of staff, he was given a popular mandate to negotiate a resolution of the problems caused by Israel's continued occupation of those same territories.

Immediately after forming a government, Rabin announced a partial freeze on settlement construction. That was far from the total freeze Washington demanded, but it was enough to persuade the Bush administration that it should encourage Rabin's moderation. When Rabin made his first state visit to the United States in 1992, President Bush announced the authorization of the contentious $10 billion loan guarantee. In taking this action, the United States surrendered some of its financial leverage over Israel without gaining a complete freeze on Israeli settlements.

Israel and the PLO: The Breakthrough of 1993

In late summer 1993, Palestinian and Israeli delegates gathered in Washington to attend the eleventh round of the peace talks begun two years earlier in Madrid. The talks had stalled, and little was expected of this new session, thus the sudden disclosure of a secret agreement reached between representatives of the Israeli government and the PLO took the world by surprise. The agreement was stunning both for its unexpectedness and its contents: It provided for mutual recognition between Israel and the PLO and laid the foundations for Palestinian autonomy in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

The circumstances that brought Israeli and PLO officials together in a series of clandestine meetings outside Oslo, Norway, in the winter and spring of 1993 originated outside normal diplomatic channels. In the course of conducting studies in the occupied territories, the director of a Norwegian research institute discovered that certain well-placed Palestinians and Israeli government officials were receptive to the idea of direct PLO-Israeli negotiations. The Norwegian government volunteered to provide facilities for secret talks, and the two parties agreed to participate. From this uncertain beginning emerged the agreements that had the potential to change the political landscape of the Middle East. A combination of factors prompted the two parties to depart sharply from their established positions. Following the Gulf War of 1991, the PLO entered a period of political and economic disarray. As its funds dried up, the organization was forced to close offices and cultural centers and to dismiss large numbers of functionaries. Yasir Arafat's tilt toward Iraq cost the organization dearly and led to criticism of his leadership. Within the occupied territories and especially in the Gaza Strip, the PLO's claim to political primacy came under renewed challenge from Hamas. The PLO leaders, fearful of being overtaken by the appeal of Hamas, looked to negotiations with Israel as a way of retaining their dominance. The attitude of the US government was another factor: The new administration of President Bill Clinton was preoccupied with domestic affairs and had a distinctly pro-Israeli bias that made it unwilling to push Israel to make concessions as President Bush had done.

Faced with a deteriorating financial base, declining popular support, and an indifferent US administration, the PLO leaders were desperate for a diplomatic triumph that would revive the organization's reputation and solidify their positions. It was evident to them—and most especially to Arafat—that the years of rejectionism and maximalist demands had failed to bring about the creation of a Palestinian state; the Norway meetings presented an opportunity—very possibly the last one their generation would have—to salvage something from their efforts, even if it meant accepting less than they had previously called for.

From the perspective of the new Israeli government, the prospect of endless violence and occupation was unacceptable. The intifada had shown the Israeli public the depth of Palestinian nationalism and had served to make many Israelis aware, for the first time, of the oppressive features of the occupation. Prime Minister Rabin had been elected on a modest peace platform but had devoted much of his first year in office to quelling Palestinian resistance organized by Hamas sympathizers. The growing strength of Hamas, with its ties to other Islamic opposition groups throughout the region, concerned the Israeli leaders and gave them cause to consider negotiations with the PLO as a means of defusing the discontent from which Hamas drew its strength.

The two agreements hammered out in the forests near Oslo were unprecedented. The first was a document of mutual recognition in which Israel recognized the PLO as the legitimate representative of the Palestinian people and, in return, the PLO unequivocally recognized Israel's right to exist in peace and security, renounced the use of terror and violence, and pledged to remove the clauses in the PLO Charter that called for the elimination of the state of Israel.

The second, formally known as the Declaration of Principles on Palestinian Self-Rule but commonly referred to as Oslo I, outlined a five-year program for interim Palestinian autonomy in the occupied territories. Although Israel would retain overall sovereignty throughout the term of the agreement, the period was divided into several stages, each of which granted increasing administrative responsibility to the Palestinians. During the first stage, Israeli troops were to withdraw from the Gaza Strip and the West Bank town of Jericho, and Palestinian authorities were to assume immediate administrative control of the two areas. In the next phase, an elected Palestinian Council was to assume responsibility for education, health, social welfare, tourism, cultural affairs, and direct taxation throughout the entire West Bank and Gaza Strip. At the same time, Israeli armed forces were to be redeployed outside the populated areas of the West Bank, though it would continue to be responsible for the security of Israeli settlers throughout the territories. It must be emphasized that Oslo I was not a peace treaty but an interim agreement that was to lead in stages to a final peace settlement. In essence, the PLO accepted the notion of interim phases without any advance agreement on what the features of the permanent settlement would be. So although the creation of an independent Palestinian state was implicit in the entire Oslo process, neither of the two 1993 documents made explicit mention of such a state. Israel simply recognized the PLO as the legitimate representative of the Palestinians and agreed to negotiate with it. The PLO, however, had fully recognized Israel's right to exist.

According to the schedule set forth at the time, the interim negotiations would conclude in 1998 with a permanent agreement based on UN Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338. Like most of the deadlines established in Oslo I, this one was not met. The declaration postponed a number of crucial issues for the interim discussions, prominent among them the future status of East Jerusalem and the Israeli settlements, the fate of Palestinian refugees living abroad, and the crucial question of Palestinian sovereignty. Yet for all the hard bargaining still to come, it appeared that the Israelis and Palestinians had, through direct negotiations, taken a major step toward peaceful coexistence.

As the two parties to the agreement worked out last-minute details, the rest of the world scrambled to catch up. Arab leaders, though upset at their total exclusion from the Norway talks, cautiously endorsed the proposal. Although the agreement had caught the United States off guard, President Clinton pledged his country's moral and financial support and agreed to reestablish formal contacts with the PLO.

On September 13, 1993, Israeli and PLO leaders assembled on the White House lawn to participate in a ceremony that would have been unimaginable a few weeks earlier. It began with the signing of the autonomy agreement and then moved to a round of speeches. When Yitzhak Rabin stepped to the podium, he admitted that, as a former soldier, he was not entirely comfortable with the agreement. However, Rabin eventually found words suitable for the occasion, proclaiming, "Enough of blood and tears. Enough!" Yasir Arafat, for so long denied permission to enter the United States, now stood in the shadow of the White House and expressed the hope that the agreement would bring a new era of peace and equal rights. Then, addressing the people of Israel, he assured them that the exercise of Palestinian sovereignty and the removal of Palestinian feelings of injustice would be the strongest guarantees of Israeli security. The speeches were followed by a defining moment when the two former enemies, PLO Chairman Arafat and Israeli Prime Minister Rabin, exchanged a handshake of reconciliation. It seemed at the time to represent one of those instances when historical patterns are overturned and new beginnings made possible.

The Promising Beginnings of the Oslo Peace Process

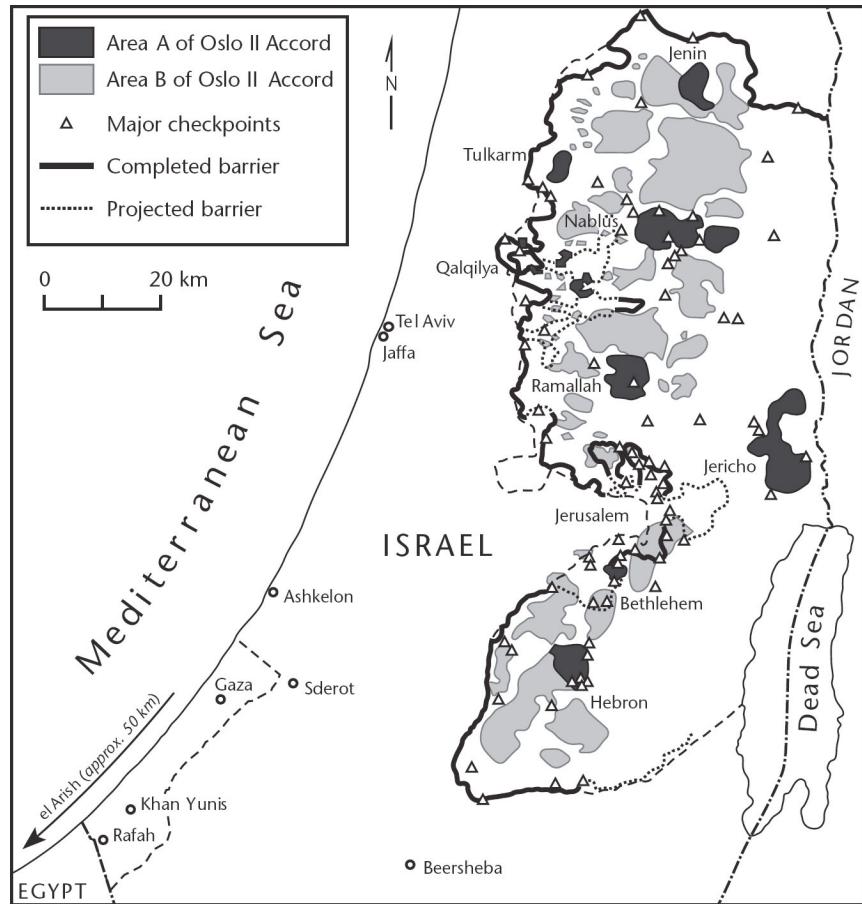

Despite intense opposition to Oslo I from prominent Israeli and Palestinian figures and despite frustrating delays and frequent setbacks in the negotiating process, the overall momentum toward a negotiated settlement was maintained for two years following the signing ceremony. The challenge facing the two parties centered on the need to add specific details to the general principles and vague guidelines of the 1993 accords. This challenge was partially addressed in two agreements signed in 1994 dealing with economic relations and the transfer of administrative authority from Israel to the Palestinians in Gaza and Jericho.

Crucial to the successful implementation of Oslo I was the establishment of a self-governing Palestinian authority. Both sides understood that Arafat and the PLO would constitute the leadership of any such authority. For Israelis, this meant allowing an individual and an organization that they had come to associate with the destruction of their state to return to Palestine. But in the optimism of the time, these reservations were put aside. In July 1994, Yasir Arafat, amid tumultuous rejoicing, established residence in Gaza and began to put in place the rudiments of an administrative and security structure. The broader regional impact of Oslo I was made dramatically evident in fall 1994, when Israel and Jordan signed a treaty of peace and mutual recognition, and President Clinton made an unprecedented visit to Syria in hopes of persuading Hafiz al-Asad to open negotiations with Israel. It appeared that the opportunity for a resolution of the entire Arab-Israeli conflict was tantalizingly near at hand.

The final agreement of the two-year period following Oslo I was signed in September 1995. Although it appeared to represent a logical outcome of the accords that had preceded it, this agreement, in combination with other developments to be discussed below, can be identified as a key factor in solidifying opposition to the peace process. Commonly referred to as Oslo II, the 1995 document spelled out in excruciating detail (it was more than 350 pages long) the stages of Israeli military redeployment in the West Bank, the process by which power would be transferred to Palestinian civil authority, and several other long- and short-term matters. But it was the clauses on redeployment and the limitations imposed on Palestinian authority that drew the most criticism. As shown in Map 23.1, Oslo II divided the West Bank into three zones and specified a phased redeployment of the Israeli Defense Forces (IDF) from each zone. However, the extent of power was to vary. At the outset, the Palestinian authority would have direct control of Area A, 3 percent of the West Bank; it would control some municipal functions and would share control with Israel in Area B, 24 percent of the territory; and Israel would retain total control of Area C, an area that made up 74 percent of the West Bank and included all of the 145 settlements in the territory.

At the beginning of the Oslo peace process, Palestinian criticism of Arafat and the accords had been downplayed in the euphoria over the apparent breakthrough to a peaceful resolution of the conflict. But the clauses and maps of Oslo II made it impossible to sustain the pretense that the PLO had done anything other than negotiate from a position of weakness and that it had received anything other than the peace of the weak. To the Palestinians who had applauded Oslo I and the promise it had seemed to hold, Oslo II looked more like a step toward the creation of Palestinian Bantustans on the West Bank than the recognition of Palestinian statehood, and they began to gravitate toward opposition groups in increasing numbers.

Problems with the Oslo Process: Two Perspectives

Palestinian. Even as the White House hosted official ceremonies of public self-congratulation for Arab and Israeli leaders at each conclusive stage of their negotiations, Palestinians continued to suffer through the hard realities of Israeli military occupation, land expropriation, and settler violence. The peace process notwithstanding, Rabin had ended the freeze on settlement construction, and Israel confiscated 20,000 acres of Palestinian-owned land on the West Bank between 1993 and 1995. Some of the confiscated lands became part of an elaborate and expensive system of bypass roads that enabled Israelis to commute from West Bank settlements to major cities in Israel without having to come into contact with the Arab inhabitants of the occupied territories. The bypass roads also served to further fragment the West Bank Palestinian community by cutting villages off from their hinterlands and by disrupting established communication networks.

Even the establishment of a Palestinian self-governing authority brought as much disappointment as it did satisfaction because the qualities that made Yasir Arafat a successful exile resistance leader did not always serve him well as a civil administrator. From the moment he arrived in Gaza in 1994, Arafat endeavored to monopolize the decision-making process in the Palestinian Authority (PA). To limit the potential for the formation of opposition groups, Arafat appointed to the top posts in the PA his loyal associates from among the former PLO exiles in Tunis. Those among the local Palestinian elite who had risen to prominence through their role in the intifada and were sensitive to the needs and aspirations of the Palestinian population were largely bypassed in favor of the exile politicians. The result was increased tension between the outsiders, disdainfully referred to as “the Tunisians” by the local Palestinian population, and the resident leadership, who were largely excluded from positions of authority.

This situation did not noticeably change with the election of a Palestinian Council in 1996. Palestinians throughout the occupied territories turned out in large numbers to cast their votes for the council of eighty-eight representatives and for the head of the PA. Although some local opposition candidates were elected, Arafat’s supporters won a comfortable majority, and Arafat was chosen president. He then simply ignored the new council and proceeded to set up an authoritarian regime buttressed by an elaborate hierarchy of security forces. As many as seven different security services, numbering upward of 40,000 men and ranging from uniformed presidential guards to ordinary policemen, were deployed on behalf of the regime. They silenced Arafat’s opponents through arbitrary arrests, brutal interrogation methods, and the enforcement of press censorship. Palestinians began to feel that the PA was becoming as oppressive as the Israeli occupation forces had been.

The deteriorating economic situation in the occupied territories after 1993 further alienated the Palestinian community from the peace accords. Instead of a period of economic prosperity, per capita income steadily declined and savings were depleted. By the late 1990s, Palestinian economic conditions were worse than they had been at any time during the Israeli occupation. This was caused in part by Israel’s practice of sealing off the territories in response to terrorist activities and thus denying Palestinians access to the Israeli labor market on which they had become dependent. The corruption within Arafat's circle also contributed to the economic malaise. Profiteering and the establishment of monopolies on the sale of basic commodities were common practices among the PLO leaders from Tunis. Arafat himself exercised control over the foreign aid donated to the PA, using it to pay his security forces and top-heavy bureaucracy instead of channeling it into infrastructure development. As the oppressive burden of economic hardship spread throughout the occupied territories, increasing numbers of Palestinians became disillusioned with the peace process and with Arafat's one-man rule.

Hamas was the main beneficiary of the growing disenchantment with the PA. From the moment Oslo I was signed, Hamas leaders vowed to oppose it. At the ideological level, their opposition was grounded in the Hamas charter (see Chapter 22). If Palestine was defined as an indivisible Islamic territory, then recognition of Israeli sovereignty over any portion of it constituted a betrayal of Hamas's guiding principle of restoring the land to Islamic rule. At the more material level, the Hamas leadership resented Arafat's takeover of the PA and his promotion of external PLO figures to positions of authority. They felt the outsiders were reaping the benefits of the sacrifices Hamas members had made during the intifada. This sentiment was shared in many quarters of Palestinian society and enabled Hamas to consolidate its position as a legitimate homegrown opposition movement to Arafat and "the Tunisians." Hamas was firmly rooted in the shared hardships and poverty that Palestinians had experienced under Israeli occupation and was more directly involved in grassroots social welfare activities than were the PA ministries.

At its most extreme, Hamas's rejection of the entire Oslo peace process was manifested in suicide bombings directed at Israeli civilians in the larger cities. A series of such attacks took place in late 1994 and early 1995, killing dozens of Israelis. The objective of the bombings was to sabotage the peace negotiations by turning the Israeli public against Rabin and the Labor government that had endorsed Oslo I.

Arafat's regime proved particularly vulnerable in its relationship to Hamas. The Israeli response to the bombings was to pressure Arafat to undertake more rigorous security measures in the areas under PA control;

he was expected to deploy his police forces in the slums of Gaza to protect the streets of West Jerusalem and Tel Aviv. Israel made it clear that if Arafat failed to rein in Hamas militants, he would prove himself to be an unreliable partner in the peace process, and negotiations would cease. In short, Israel encouraged Arafat to become the authoritarian ruler he was already inclined to be. Yet in complying with Israeli demands and conducting raids against Hamas organizations and jailing hundreds of suspected activists, Arafat undermined his credibility and turned Palestinians against his administration.

Israeli. In the aftermath of Oslo I in 1993, the majority of Israelis were prepared to give Rabin's peace initiative a chance to succeed. However, the Hamas bombings and the prospect of the eventual establishment of an independent Palestinian state brought to the forefront of public concerns the sensitive issue of security, an issue that had served to unify the diverse strands of Israeli society since the formation of the state. If the Oslo Accords did not lead to security, then the peace process was not worth pursuing.

Opposition to the Oslo process was increasingly framed in religious terms. Like Hamas's founders, Jewish religious spokesmen presented a vision of the West Bank as sacred land and argued that any Israeli withdrawal would constitute a surrender of the biblical heritage of the Jewish people. To those who shared this vision, the Oslo compromise giving up portions of the West Bank in exchange for peace was more than a security risk; it was a violation of God's covenant and of a divinely presented opportunity to restore the connection between the Jews and the land God had promised them. In 1995, a group of rabbis placed the religious imperative above the laws of the state by issuing a decree instructing soldiers to resist orders to evacuate army bases in the West Bank. Orthodox and nationalist organizations vilified Prime Minister Rabin, and with each Hamas bombing, other segments of the population began to question the risks to which Rabin's peace process exposed Israel.

Israeli militants, like their counterparts in Hamas, resorted to violence to express their opposition to the Oslo Accords. In February 1994, Baruch Goldstein, an Israeli settler activist, turned an automatic weapon on a large gathering of Palestinians praying in the Mosque of Abraham in the West Bank city of Hebron, killing twenty-nine of them before he himself was killed. Goldstein's murderous assault brought to the surface a threatening undercurrent of violence circulating within Israeli society. On November 4, 1995, that current manifested itself in a sudden and tragic moment. As Prime Minister Rabin was leaving a large peace rally in Tel Aviv, he was assassinated by Yigal Amir, a young Israeli student at an institute of Jewish religious studies.

Israel briefly ceased its internal strife to mourn Rabin and to ponder the forces that had spawned his assassin. Subsequent investigations showed that Amir had received a devoutly Jewish religious education and that he acted out of the conviction that Jewish law required the death of any Jew who turned Jewish land over to the enemy. Once again, Israeli society seemed to be torn from within, and the question of which of the competing ideological forces would control the future direction of the country was prominently raised. It remained a critical question in the election to choose a new prime minister and, in the process, to determine whether the Oslo Accords would survive Rabin's death.

The assassination of Rabin left negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians suspended. But developments in the two years following Oslo I had revealed the lack of mutual trust that still divided the two peoples: There existed among Israelis a lingering suspicion that Palestinians were unreliable terrorists and, among Palestinians, a suspicion that the Israelis were determined expansionists.

THE UNRAVELING OF THE OSLO PEACE PROCESS

The Rise and Fall of the First Netanyahu Government

Yigal Amir and other like-minded Israelis were not the only individuals who sought to destroy the peace process. During the interval between Rabin's assassination and the Israeli elections of May 1996, Hamas carried out another round of suicide bombings in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv that caused public opinion to shift away from support for the peace process. The Israeli government responded with a demonstration of its dominance over the Palestinians, sealing off the occupied territories, placing many West Bank towns under curfew, and causing increased economic distress within the Palestinian community. This crackdown, in turn, fed the atmosphere of hopelessness and despair among the Palestinians and led more and more of them to turn away from Arafat and the unsatisfactory status quo he represented.

In this atmosphere of heightened tension, Israelis, by the narrowest of margins, elected as their new prime minister Binyamin Netanyahu, the leader of the Likud coalition. Netanyahu, a proponent of Jabotinsky's Revisionist Zionism, had campaigned on a pledge to "slow down" the peace process. Subsequent events showed that what he meant by that phrase was to end the process as it had been defined by the Oslo Accords. Yigal Amir's bullets and the bombs of Hamas had, it seemed, achieved their intended results.

Netanyahu's coalition lurched from one self-induced crisis to another, barely managing to survive. In his need to conciliate the religious and nationalist elements upon which his coalition government depended, Netanyahu adopted hard-line policies toward the occupied territories. He refused to acknowledge any connection between land and peace, assuring Israelis that they could have security, settlements, and peaceful coexistence with the Palestinians. At the same time, he inaugurated a new round of provocative settlement activities—initiating the construction of new settlements and expanding existing ones—that seemed to invite Palestinian retaliation. It has been estimated that as many as 5,000 housing units were under construction in the West Bank during 1997. The low prices of government-subsidized housing in the occupied territories proved attractive, and by the end of 1998, some 350,000 Israelis resided in areas that had been taken in the June War: 180,000 in annexed East Jerusalem, 164,000 in the West Bank, and 5,500 in the Gaza Strip.¹

The most controversial of the several settlement projects was the start of a large settlement on confiscated Arab land in East Jerusalem that would eventually house 25,000 Israelis. This was a violation of the Oslo Accords, which stated that no change in the status quo of Jerusalem should take place until final negotiations. The late Prime Minister Menachem Begin's efforts to create "facts on the ground" found its fulfillment in the Netanyahu government's strenuous attempts to predetermine the contours of any final status agreement in such a way that a pronounced Israeli demographic component, with the necessary security apparatus, would have to be taken into consideration and in such a way that any future Palestinian autonomy would be limited to fragmented and disconnected sections of isolated enclaves. While it promoted settlement activities in the occupied territories, Netanyahu's government stalled on carrying out the full range of troop redeployments agreed to in the Oslo Accords.

The intensified Israeli settlement activities exposed the most serious flaw in the entire Oslo process: the imbalance of power between the two parties. The Oslo negotiation process was not carried out between equals. Israel was the occupying power, and Oslo I consigned the Palestinians to the status of the occupied for at least the full five years of the interim agreement. Moreover, because the Oslo agreements were made by the PLO and Israel alone, they fell completely outside the domain of the United Nations and were not subject to any UN resolutions or enforcement mechanisms. Although the United States, as the moral guarantor of the Oslo Accords, could and did raise objections to Israel's land confiscation, increased settlement activities, and refusal to redeploy its troops, Washington showed no inclination to back up its objections and in fact vetoed UN Security Council resolutions condemning settlement construction. Thus, Israel could ignore the terms of Oslo I with impunity, whereas the Palestinians had no choice but to bow to superior Israeli power.

The Israeli provocations caused a sadly familiar pattern to repeat itself: Hamas responded with another suicide bombing in summer 1997; Israel then sealed off the occupied territories more tightly than ever and demanded that Arafat and the PA increase their efforts to arrest Hamas activists. Arafat, his credibility rapidly declining, was reduced to acting as Israel's policeman in PA territory, to complaining fruitlessly about Israel's refusal to implement the Oslo redeployments, and to making provocative statements to disguise his inability to exercise substantial influence on the erosion of the peace process. The continued deterioration of Palestinian-Israeli relations raised the possibility of a major armed confrontation more violent and deadly than the intifada had been.

As tensions increased, the Clinton administration finally assumed a more direct role in the stagnant peace process. US pressure succeeded in bringing Netanyahu and Arafat together at the Wye River estate in Maryland in autumn 1998. After days of bitter haggling mediated by President Clinton, Arafat and Netanyahu signed a set of agreements known as the Wye Accords. The most significant aspect of the Wye Accords was not the agreement itself but rather Netanyahu's reluctant acceptance of the principle of exchanging occupied land for peace and security. In accepting this principle, he created deep rifts within the ruling Likud coalition, which had consistently demanded the establishment of Greater Israel and denounced all compromises on withdrawal from West Bank territory. As his government teetered on the brink of collapse, Netanyahu sought to appease his critics on the religious Right with an announcement that Israel would suspend its scheduled withdrawal from an additional 13 percent of the West Bank. This was a violation of the Wye Accords he had signed only a month earlier. Riddled by dissension within and pressured by the United States from the outside, the Netanyahu government voted in December 1998 to dissolve itself and hold new elections. Netanyahu's attempt to satisfy the United States and the Israeli moderates by signing the Wye Accords and to mollify the religious Right by refusing to carry them out had failed. He now had to submit his government's record to the Israeli electorate.

Although we have so far concentrated on Israeli-Palestinian relations, it should be noted that Likud's domestic policies also contributed to its downfall. In the bitter contest over the role of religion in the state, Netanyahu catered to the religious Right. The government posed as the protector of Israel's Jewish identity in the face of secular assaults from within Israel and from the homogenizing effects of globalization on cultural distinctiveness in general. And in a gesture of support for the religious conservatives, Netanyahu himself increased state subsidies to ultra-Orthodox educational and social programs. His courting of the religious Right led secular Israelis to view him as a figure prepared to place Israeli interests under the control of Orthodox religious circles, thus intensifying the cultural war that was already dividing Israeli society.

The Election of Barak and Camp David II

When Israelis went to the polls in May 1999, they delivered a harsh verdict on Netanyahu's leadership. Ehud Barak, a dovish hawk in the image of his mentor, the late Yitzhak Rabin, received 56 percent of the votes for prime minister to Netanyahu's 44 percent. In the context of Israeli politics, this constituted a landslide victory for Barak and showed that Israelis had become disenchanted with Netanyahu's political machinations, the divisiveness associated with his leadership, and his failure to pursue a true peace agreement with the Palestinians.

If Barak's victory represented the majority of Israelis' desire for a revival of the peace process, the results of elections to the Knesset revealed a society deeply divided on domestic issues. Between 1996 and 2003, Israeli voters cast two ballots, one for prime minister and another for the party list. In the 1999 elections, an unprecedented thirty-three parties received official authorization to field candidates, and fifteen of these parties ended up with representation in the Knesset. The problem this proliferation of parties presented to the formation of a stable governing coalition was compounded by several competing domestic agendas among them. For example, the two parties that made the biggest gains in the Knesset held firm—and opposing—views on the role of religion in the state. One was a new rigorously secular party, Shinui, and the other was Shas, an ultra-Orthodox religious party of Sephardic Jews that became the third-largest party in the Knesset. Shas did not object to the peace process, but it rejected the concept of a secular legal system and insisted instead that Israel should be governed by Jewish law. The growth of these two parties suggested that the issue of peace with the Palestinians was no less divisive than the differences between secular and religious sectors of Israeli society. And Israel's electoral system embedded these differences in day-to-day political life, ensuring further factionalism and stalemate.

During the election campaign, Barak had also pledged to end the eighteen-year-old Israeli occupation of southern Lebanon. Some Israelis welcomed the unilateral withdrawal of Israeli forces, believing it would bring calm if not formal peace. Others worried that it would serve only to bolster Hizbullah's status across the Arab world while damaging Israel's deterrent power. This concern took on greater weight when the evacuation, undertaken in May 2000, turned into a hasty retreat in the face of Hizbullah attacks. For Palestinians frustrated with the failure of the Oslo peace process to bring about an end to Israeli occupation, Hizbullah's advances became a dramatic inspiration.

As Barak entered into negotiations with Arafat and the PA, he confronted the bitter factionalism and polarity that had come to dominate Israeli political life. His popularity declined precipitously. What eventually brought down his government was the Right's reaction to the scale of concessions he allegedly offered the PA at a two-week summit conference known as Camp David II, convened by US President Bill Clinton in July 2000. With little advance preparation, both sides went to Camp David facing huge challenges in bridging the chasm between them as well as the distances that separated each of them from large sections of their populations at home. Camp David II ended in an impasse, but for the first time the final status issues that had been deferred for seven years—including sovereignty over East Jerusalem, the future of Jewish settlements, and the right of return for Palestinian refugees—were subject to negotiation. Because no written offers were placed on the table during the conference, reports on the precise nature of the exchanges between Barak and Arafat differed widely.

By all accounts, however, the deadlock over how to share or divide Jerusalem proved especially troublesome. Barak's offer to grant the PA partial sovereignty over certain sections of the city did not meet Palestinian demands for sovereignty in East Jerusalem, although the offer went far beyond anything former Israeli negotiators had considered. It was anathema to the Likud opposition and other rightist parties that insisted on retaining Israeli sovereignty over an expanded and united Jerusalem with no Palestinian governing authority allowed in it. As a result, several of Barak's cabinet members resigned and left him with a minority government. In December 2000, Barak announced his own resignation and called for a special election in which he hoped to receive a popular mandate for pressing forward with his peace initiatives.

The Second Intifada

The election campaign took place against the backdrop of a new Palestinian uprising and harsh Israeli reprisals. The factors that prompted the uprising were firmly rooted in the Oslo peace process's failure to halt Israeli efforts to colonize the occupied West Bank and Gaza Strip and in the parallel failure of Yasir Arafat and the Palestinian Authority to provide competent and honest governance. At the core of the uprising was the Palestinian reaction to the increasingly oppressive Israeli occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip, the ever-expanding network of settlements, and the inability or unwillingness of outside mediation to stop it. The proliferation of Israeli military checkpoints and the ongoing confiscation of land increased Palestinians' feelings of being dispossessed and deprived of a future.

Those sentiments exploded in an outbreak of anger sparked when Ariel Sharon undertook a provocative gesture. In late September 2000, Sharon, now fully rehabilitated as leader of the Likud and accompanied by a security force 1,000 strong, made a visit to the Haram al-Sharif or, in Jewish terminology, the Temple Mount, in Jerusalem. Sharon intended to demonstrate that any Jew had the right to visit the Jewish holy site and so, in the context of the election campaign, discredit Barak's alleged willingness to compromise. But the Palestinians regarded the visit as an affront to Islam and protested in an outbreak of demonstrations and stone throwing. The Israeli reaction was swift and deadly—during the first two days of protest, Israeli security forces killed eighteen Palestinians, turning a series of demonstrations into a sustained popular uprising that soon spread beyond Arafat's control. The violence spread even to northern Israel: When Israeli Arabs in Galilee demonstrated in support, Israeli police fired on the crowd, killing thirteen. For Palestinians, the lethal use of force against demonstrators revealed the disdain Israel held for their lives and safety. For Israelis, the violent uprising, coming so soon after the collapse of the Camp David talks, was proof that Arafat was not a partner for peace and that the Palestinian leadership would never repudiate violence. It once again placed the issue of security and its assurance through massive force of arms at the top of the electoral agenda.

As the second intifada gathered steam, and although the leaders of both sides were unable or unwilling to exercise restraint, their negotiators nonetheless continued to work toward a settlement of the final status issues. In December 2000, following his party's loss in the previous month's US election, President Clinton put one last effort into salvaging the process by drawing up the parameters of a peace plan that, in addition to setting forth ideas to resolve the questions of Jerusalem and the refugees' right of return, envisaged the Palestinians getting between 94 percent and 96 percent of the West Bank for a future Palestinian state. Israel would annex portions of West Bank land comprising the major settlements, Palestinians would be compensated with a land swap, and arrangements would be made for a corridor connecting Gaza and the West Bank.

After marathon meetings held in the Egyptian resort town of Taba in January 2001, Palestinian and Israeli negotiators tentatively agreed on a more detailed framework based on the Clinton parameters. Negotiators for both sides announced that they had never been so close to resolving the outstanding issues. Nevertheless, overtaken by the escalating violence on the ground and with both Clinton's and Barak's terms of office coming to an end, the agreement had little time to take effect. As one negotiator lamented, "If Camp David was too little, Taba was too late."²

In the February 2001 election, Barak's opponent, Ariel Sharon, projected the image of an old warrior who knew how to protect Israel's security but who could also pursue a peaceful resolution to the conflict with the Palestinians. In a devastating rebuke to Barak, Sharon received 62 percent of the votes to Barak's 37 percent. Voter turnout was the lowest in Israeli history, attributable in large part to widespread disillusionment in the peace camp and to the boycott of the polls by Israeli Arabs, previously some of the Labor Party's most supportive voters. When Sharon assumed office, he became Israel's fifth prime minister in six years—another statistic illuminating the divisiveness within Israeli society.

As Sharon formed his government, television newscasts, in what looked like a replay of the first intifada, showed Palestinian youths throwing stones and Molotov cocktails at Israeli military vehicles while Israeli soldiers responded with live ammunition. But this uprising differed in several respects: The goals of the uprising were not clearly stated, popular participation was not as widespread, and no coordinated leadership group emerged. The driving force of the second intifada consisted of loosely organized groups of young men affiliated either with one of the militant Islamic groups (Hamas and Islamic Jihad) or with Yasir Arafat's al-Fatah.

Another difference between the two intifadas was the relative militarization of the second one. On the Palestinian side, the Islamic groups intensified their suicide bombing campaigns and were joined by elements of the Palestinian security forces armed with light automatic weapons; the stones and burning tires that had characterized the first intifada were still present, but they no longer symbolized the Palestinian preference for nonviolent protest. On the Israeli side, the use of force was far deadlier and more heavily mechanized than before. The IDF deployed tanks, Apache helicopters, and F-16 fighter jets against what was essentially a civilian population. As the uprising continued into 2002, Israel escalated its military operations and forcibly reoccupied all the territory in the West Bank and Gaza Strip that it had earlier turned over to the Palestinian Authority. At the same time, Israel imposed an internal closure on the West Bank, prohibiting Palestinians from leaving their communities of residence and effectively shutting down all forms of internal commerce. The result was economic disaster for the occupied territories.

What were the elements of the uprising that, in the view of Israeli officials, warranted such extensive use of military force and so much human suffering? The answer was once again grounded in the desire for security. The young Palestinian suicide bombers who struck marketplaces, malls, nightclubs, and public transportation inside Israel heightened the Israeli public's feelings of vulnerability. These deadly attacks prompted the massive Israeli military intervention that, in turn, led to new waves of suicide bombings.

THE ROAD FROM TABA

It is hard to overstate the crushing effect of the spiral of violence and the mistrust and hatred it revealed or manufactured on the chances of a resolution to the conflict. The main ingredients of a peace settlement based on a two-state solution were no longer a mystery, spelled out as they had been by the Clinton parameters and further detailed in the Taba blueprint. But like the story of the lost traveler who, after asking a local farmer for directions to his destination, is told, “If I were going there, I wouldn’t start from here,” no common ground could be found from which the two sides could begin again down the road to a negotiated peace; the distance between the diplomatic discourse about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and the perceptions on the ground had grown too large.

Between the fall of 2000 and the summer of 2003, the second intifada claimed the lives of 2,400 Palestinians and 780 Israelis. In this time, several initiatives emerged that aimed at breaking the diplomatic deadlock, but all failed. Among the more significant were the Arab League peace initiative, the road map of the “international quartet,” and the Geneva accord. In early 2002, Saudi Arabia attempted to rescue the peace process and received the unanimous support of the Arab League meeting in Beirut (the governments of Syria and Saddam Husayn’s Iraq included). The proposal promised a normalization of relations between Arab states and Israel in return for an independent Palestinian state on almost all the occupied territories, with East Jerusalem as its capital, and a solution to the refugee problem based more on compensation than on repatriation. The Arab League peace initiative was followed the next year by the efforts of a quartet of powers, consisting of the United States, the European Union, Russia, and the United Nations, to lay out a “road map” for ending the conflict. Released in April 2003, shortly after the Anglo-American invasion of Iraq, the plan envisaged a three-stage program. But lacking any enforcement mechanisms to monitor compliance with each stage’s requirements, the road map only led the two sides in circles. With the resultant stalling of international efforts and the violence unabating, prominent Israeli and Palestinian politicians launched their own effort in December 2003. Known as the Geneva accord, this initiative eschewed gradualist measures and instead sought a comprehensive agreement that filled in some of the gaps left by the Taba talks.

Israeli Disengagement

By 2004, the focus of peace negotiations had shifted to the internal political dynamics of the two sides, with the Palestinian leadership growing increasingly fractured and isolated and Prime Minister Ariel Sharon pushing a unilateral Israeli approach on the grounds that he had no negotiating partners. The favorable reception in Israel to the Geneva accord, even amid the continuing bloodshed, prompted Sharon to announce his own plan by which Israelis would unilaterally separate from Palestinians. The policy came to be known as “disengagement,” and it involved, in the first stage, the removal of all settlers from the Gaza Strip and from four settlements in the northern West Bank. Gathering support from left-wing parties, Sharon pushed the plan through the Knesset, and in August 2005, he successfully completed the planned evacuation of settlers from Gaza. But he could not overcome the critics within his own Likud party, many of whom felt betrayed by a leader elected on a platform opposing any withdrawal from lands the party traditionally regarded as an integral part of Israel. In November 2005, Sharon quit the party in frustration and formed a new party, called Kadima (“Forward”), while his longtime rival Binyamin Netanyahu succeeded him as head of Likud.

What prompted Sharon, once the chief personification of the settlement ethos, to turn his back on the Gaza settlers? On the one hand, the answer to this question lay in the evident failure of force of arms to stop the second intifada and the pressing need to show some initiative in the face of diplomatic deadlock. For Sharon, disengagement held the promise not only of eclipsing the international road map but also of putting any talk of a two-state solution firmly on the back burner. On the other hand, the uprooting of 8,000 Jewish settlers from Gaza, a small strip of land home to 1.3 million Palestinian Arabs, can be seen as a response to the apocalyptic terms with which the higher Arab birthrate was being discussed in Israeli politics. Sharon saw that the dream of a greater Israel—that is, a Jewish state in all of mandate Palestine—could not be reconciled with demographic projections of an Arab majority in the land between the Jordan River and the Mediterranean.

Moreover, in gaining American support for his new policy, Sharon received President George W. Bush’s endorsement for the idea that Israel would keep the largest settlement blocs in the West Bank in any future deal. Until that point, US policy had treated the resolution of boundary questions—crucial to any eventual two-state solution—as a negotiated step to be taken by Palestinians and Israelis together. By supporting Sharon’s unilateral disengagement plan, Bush was widely seen to be accepting Israel’s right to impose a solution. Thus, pulling settlements out of Gaza provided Sharon with international political cover for securing Israeli control over West Bank settlements.

A key component of disengagement in the West Bank was the construction of a physical barrier made up of a complex network of barbed wire, electric fences, patrol roads, and concrete walls eight meters (about twenty-six feet) high. Israel justified building this system of walls and fences as a necessary response to suicide bombers attacking Tel Aviv and other Israeli cities. Palestinians viewed the measure as a grave violation of international law (a view endorsed by the International Court of Justice in 2004) and condemned the way it snaked its way many miles east of the 1967 green line (marking the borders of Israel after 1949). Whereas Gaza had already been completely surrounded by fences built along the 1967 border, the walls and fences in the West Bank enveloped large Israeli settlement blocs, thereby isolating and dividing Palestinian villages and absorbing large tracts of Palestinian agricultural land.

When Sharon was felled by a stroke in January 2006, ending his political career, his deputy, Ehud Olmert, stepped in as acting prime minister. In elections held in March, Olmert was confirmed as prime minister after Kadima campaigned on a platform of fulfilling Sharon's disengagement plan. But the July war with Hizbulah undermined that agenda (see Chapter 24). The offensive exposed the limits to Israel's deterrent power. Moreover, as Israelis suffered through the thousands of rocket attacks launched by Hizbulah (from Lebanese territory that Israel had unilaterally withdrawn from in 2000) at the same time as rockets were fired into Israel from across the border in Gaza (evacuated in 2005), they grew wary of any further withdrawal from territory without agreements assuring them that an effective Palestinian government was in place to keep the peace. Nonetheless, Olmert held secret and far-reaching talks with Mahmoud Abbas, Arafat's successor as leader of al-Fatah, who was elected as president of the PA after Arafat's death in November 2004. Olmert and Abbas allegedly came closer to reaching an agreement than any previous efforts between two leaders. But the negotiations collapsed in 2008 once Olmert, who was under investigation for a corruption scandal, announced he would step down as Israeli prime minister, and his party lost power.

In the March 2009 election, Israeli voters elected Binyamin Netanyahu as prime minister for the second time. Pressed by the United States to finally support a two-state solution, Netanyahu delivered a speech at Bar Ilan University in June; in it, he put forth a vision of peace in which "two peoples live freely, side by side, in amity and mutual respect." Netanyahu's ostensible approval of a Palestinian state, however, was so burdened with preconditions that most saw it as little more than a political ploy. He failed to produce a plan to bring a state into being, and he refused Palestinian offers to relaunch talks, subject to a complete freeze of the settlement program and the release of Palestinian prisoners.

Instead, pushed by nationalist-religious members of his governing coalition who rejected the two-state solution outright, Netanyahu added new negotiating demands. For Palestinians, the most exacting of Netanyahu's preconditions was that they now recognize Israel as a specifically Jewish state. Abbas dismissed the demand as unacceptable, saying it neglected Palestinian history and compromised the rights of Palestinian citizens in Israel. Netanyahu's preconditions also included the refusal to share Jerusalem, insistence on continued Israeli military control of the Jordan valley, and rejection of a withdrawal to the 1967 "green line" as the basis of a redrawn border that accommodates land swaps. Further complicating the question of future borders, Netanyahu used the continued military and civil control over Area C, as designated under the terms of the Oslo Accords, to consolidate the settlement infrastructure (including housing as well as fenced-off access roads) while denying permits for any Palestinian construction projects. Taken together, Netanyahu's demands have since then effectively buried any chance of negotiating a workable Palestinian state. Indeed, while campaigning for right-wing voters during the hard-fought 2015 elections, Netanyahu clearly disavowed his 2009 endorsement of a Palestinian state and ruled one out for the foreseeable future.

Content to manage the conflict rather than resolving it, Netanyahu allowed domestic debates to shift from the conflict with Palestinians toward a focus on economic issues and Israeli fears of Iran's nuclear program (see Chapter 25). Israeli voters voiced more concerns about the cost of living and high levels of inequality in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv than about the plight of Palestinians, who are largely rendered invisible behind walls and fences. In this context, the military operations launched against Gaza every few years, involving an overwhelming use of force to combat Hamas rockets, are prosaically referred to as just "mowing the lawn."

With the occupation entering its fiftieth year, critics fear that Netanyahu's comfort with managing the status quo ignores how untenable the situation really is. On the one hand, Israel is growing increasingly isolated and its international standing is declining. There has been an increase in the number of European parliaments who now recognize a Palestinian state. The campaign for boycotts, divestment, and sanctions against Israel, known as “BDS,” has gradually been expanding beyond universities and churches. On the other hand, a new wave of violence erupted in East Jerusalem in October 2015, with uncoordinated attacks by individual Palestinians, using cars and knives, as well as reprisal shootings by Israelis. The worst outbreak of communal conflict since the second intifada, the spreading violence was directly attributed to the incendiary conditions of perpetual occupation; chief among these were the despair born of economic stagnation and the sense of insecurity stoked by the vigilantism of Israeli settlers, including a firebomb attack on a Palestinian home that claimed the lives of three family members, including a toddler.

No less significant is the growing consensus of a new generation of Palestinian youth who see the conflict with Israel as a struggle for civil rights rather than as one for sovereignty and are experiencing growing disillusionment with their own leadership’s division into what are increasingly viewed as two self-serving, unaccountable, and increasingly isolated entities, al-Fatah and Hamas, each ruling a separate enclave.

Palestinian Fragmentation

From the start, Sharon defended Israel’s unilateral disengagement plan as a strategy necessitated by a lack of serious Palestinian partners with whom to negotiate. Although some observers argued that negotiating a two-state solution with Yasir Arafat was of vital importance because of the historic legitimacy he could confer on the painful but necessary compromises demanded of the Palestinians, both the Israeli and the American governments insisted on blaming Arafat for the ongoing stalemate in the peace process and the continued violence. In 2002, Israeli forces confined Arafat to his shattered Ramallah compound. Yet it immediately became clear that no one else had the authority to negotiate in his place, and the Palestinian leadership appeared increasingly adrift. Factionalism in Palestinian politics took on a generational aspect: Internal splits deepened within al-Fatah between competing camps centered on old and young leaders, and the PA security forces were in similar disarray. Meanwhile, relations between the PA (dominated by the secular al-Fatah party) and the Islamist Hamas deteriorated, and the division took on a geographical form, with Hamas's support based solidly in Gaza and al-Fatah's much stronger in the West Bank.

Abbas, Arafat's successor, had opposed the second intifada and called for a return to negotiations. But he first sought to steady the Palestinian political situation. Abbas proposed integrating Hamas into the constitutional structures developed under the Oslo accords by challenging Hamas at the polling booth. Some Palestinian and foreign observers denounced sharing power with the Islamist movement, but Abbas argued that Hamas's inclusion in the Palestinian legislative council would impose on them the responsibility to abide by its laws. Elections were set for January 2006.

Abbas faced great challenges in trying to rebuild the unity and credibility of his own party, al-Fatah. At first, some hoped his leadership could be bolstered by successfully persuading the Israeli government to release prisoners or ease the checkpoints that, together with the Jewish settlements and their access roads, had effectively divided the West Bank into separated regions. The suffering and indignity such checkpoints caused was one of the most disruptive and painful daily reminders of the occupation. Despite Abbas's efforts, however, the number of physical obstacles, as reported by UN monitors, actually increased from 376 to 534 between August 2005 and December 2006 (see Map 23.1). Abbas thus had little to show in terms of his diplomatic efforts, whereas Hamas actively took credit for forcing Israel out of the Gaza Strip. With the once-dominant al-Fatah party in disarray, by 2006, Hamas had established itself as a much stronger political force than many—including, perhaps, its own members—had expected.

Although divisions in Hamas existed (notably between leaders in Gaza and those exiled in neighboring Arab countries), the party proved to be well placed to take advantage of the growing protests against the al-Fatah regime's corruption and incompetence and its failures in achieving statehood. In the 2006 election campaign, Hamas promised clean government and stressed its record of efficiency in providing basic services, especially in Gaza, and it dramatically won 76 seats to al-Fatah's 43 in the 132-seat legislative chamber. The result shocked the international community. Immediately, the Bush administration as well as many other international powers joined Israel in refusing to recognize the new government. The declared policy was to force Hamas to honor previous Palestinian commitments, recognize Israel's right of existence, and renounce violence. Western leaders defended their refusal to deal with a party that rejected Israel and was held responsible for abhorrent terrorist acts. In response, Palestinians resented being punished for their democratic choices. Meanwhile, their leaders failed to reach a consensus on how to build power-sharing institutions or political platforms that would relieve international pressure. Al-Fatah and Hamas instead continued to fight over power, with some al-Fatah leaders behaving as though they were still in charge.

This confrontation was most pronounced in Gaza, where political tensions were exacerbated by deteriorating social and economic conditions as well as by a growing lawlessness marked by a brutal series of shootings and kidnappings that left dozens dead. With its grip on Gaza loosening, Hamas became increasingly concerned that forces loyal to President Abbas were preparing, with US and Israeli support, to overthrow its administration. In June 2007, Hamas swiftly but brutally seized all the main al-Fatah bases in Gaza. Abbas accused Hamas of staging a coup. Retaining his position as president in the West Bank, where al-Fatah was much more secure, Abbas dismissed the newly elected Hamas-led government and created an emergency cabinet to rule the West Bank separately from the Gaza Strip. In the face of these adverse circumstances, Hamas acted to secure its military position and to mitigate the full impact of isolation. Tunnels under the border with Egypt, for example, were improved and brought under the oversight of Hamas officials, including tax collectors.

This semi-official smuggling system facilitated the flow of goods and money and contributed to the manufacture of rockets that disparate militant groups fired incessantly at neighboring towns in Israel, especially Sderot, terrorizing the populations but causing few casualties. The Israeli government, facing great pressure to respond to the shelling, buttressed its economic blockade with frequent military assaults and aerial bombardments, which caused many more casualties. In the years since Hamas took control over the Gaza Strip, Israel has launched three large military operations, the main objective of which was to end the ability of Hamas and other groups to fire rockets into Israel as well as to destroy the tunnel network Hamas used to infiltrate into Israel in order to kidnap soldiers. With these measures, Israel insists it is exercising its right to self-defense, portraying its operations as a precise degrading of Palestinian militants' capacity to fire rockets indiscriminately. But the grossly disproportionate number of civilian-to-military deaths among Gazans and the destruction of whole neighborhoods to rubble have led UN missions to conclude that both Israel and Hamas are guilty of war crimes. A UN report published in 2015 warned that the successive military operations and decade-long blockade could render the Gaza Strip "uninhabitable" by 2020.

With the West Bank fragmented by walls, fences, and checkpoints and ever more truncated by the creeping annexation of settlement building, the possibility of a viable Palestinian state appears to be eroding. But even if settlement infrastructure construction could be reversed and the leaders were to reach an agreement on a two-state solution, it is not clear that the discredited Palestinian Authority of Mahmoud Abbas retains sufficient legitimacy or credibility to sign off on it. What appears clear is that an effective Palestinian strategy for self-determination requires a unified polity. Although a united Palestinian national leadership may not be a sufficient condition for reviving the peace process, it remains a necessary one.

CONCLUSION

First laid out in the 2001 Taba accords, the parameters for a territorial resolution of the century-old Palestinian-Israeli conflict have since been elaborated upon by several initiatives. In 2009, President Obama underlined the strengthening international consensus supporting a two-state solution: "The only resolution is for the aspirations of both sides to be met through two states, where Israelis and Palestinians each live in peace and security. That is in Israel's interest, Palestine's interest, America's interest, and the world's interest." Three years later, on November 29, 2012, the UN General Assembly recognized a Palestinian state. Yet the actual prospects for a two-state solution in fact appear to be fading. A quarter century after the George H. W. Bush administration embarked on an extensive effort to achieve a resolution to the Palestinian-Israel conflict, progress on the diplomatic front is nonexistent and the prospects dismal. When US Secretary of State John Kerry launched the most recent failed bid to establish a Palestinian state in May 2013, he warned that “if we do not succeed now, we may not get another chance.”

As the diplomatic failures, violent clashes, and spiraling mistrust marking the years since Taba render a two-state solution more illusory than elusive, the ramifications of the one-state scenario are being given more serious consideration. One version posits a shared homeland: a binational state with equal rights for both Jewish and Palestinian national communities. If this scenario costs Israel its dream of a Jewish state, the alternative costs Israel its democracy. In the absence of equal rights for a Palestinian Arab population that is growing more quickly than Israel’s Jewish population, the alternative version of the one-state scenario would permanently consign Palestinians to fragmented Bantustans. At the end of 2007, Ehud Olmert issued a warning to Israelis that unless the opportunity of a two-state solution was grasped soon, changing demographics would carry the danger of forcing Israel to become an apartheid-like state: “If the day comes when the two-state solution collapses, and we face a South African–style struggle for equal voting rights . . . the State of Israel is finished.”³ Former prime minister Ehud Barak echoed the diagnosis in 2010: “If, and as long as between the Jordan and the sea, there is only one political entity, named Israel, it will end up being either non-Jewish or non-democratic. . . . If the Palestinians vote in elections, it is a binational state, and if they don’t, it is an apartheid state.”

CHAPTER 24

PATTERNS OF CONTINUITY AND CHANGE IN TURKEY, IRAN, AND LEBANON

This chapter focuses on Turkey, Iran, and Lebanon. The years after the 1991 Gulf War were unsettled ones for the peoples and states of the Middle East. Popular disaffection with the ruling elites spread throughout the region, whether in Islamic Iran, secular Turkey, or sectarian Lebanon (the Islamist opposition in Egypt will be discussed in more detail in Chapter 26). In Turkey and the south of Lebanon, this disaffection found expression in the renewed growth of Islamist movements and their relative electoral advances. In Iran, however, discontent with the rule of the conservative ulama led to an increasing desire for more pluralism, especially among youth, but this development was then followed by frustration with both the perceived ineffectiveness of a more reformist government and the ulama's determination to retake control.

TURKEY AND IRAN: NATIONS AT A CROSSROADS

This book has often compared and contrasted developments in these two states, the most populous non-Arab countries in the Middle Eastern region. During the period under review, both of them appeared to depart from the historical patterns that had characterized their social and political development for the previous twenty years. Islamist prime ministers were elected in secular Turkey, and in Iran, a restive youth population turned away from the Islamization program imposed by the ulama-led government and embraced aspects of secular Western popular culture. Responses from the vested interests in both systems produced a high degree of volatility even before the region was riven by civil wars and religious sectarianism.

Political Islam and the Military: Challenge to Turkish Democracy

After the military intervened in politics to curtail the activities of the political Left in 1980–1983 (see Chapter 14), centrist or right-of-center parties dominated Turkey’s governing coalitions. This trend continued in the early 1990s under the rightist True Path Party, headed in 1993 by Tansu Ciller, Turkey’s first female prime minister. The True Path Party maintained the orientation toward a free-market economy that had begun in the 1980s and had facilitated the emergence of a new class of wealthy entrepreneurs who embarked on a binge of conspicuous consumption. The True Path Party’s policies obviously benefited the group that became known as “the have lots.”

But the prosperity of the private sector did not affect all of the country’s citizens equally. In order to establish free-market principles, the state reduced its subsidies to the agricultural sector, which led to increased migration from the countryside to the larger cities. Nor did the urban working classes gain from the influx of wealth into Turkey. Restrictions had been introduced under military rule on collective bargaining rights; strikes were forbidden, and as a result, workers’ wages were depressed at a time of increasing prosperity for the business elite. Turkey’s huge income disparities were reflected in a deepening political divide within the population. Whereas the pro-business True Path coalition satisfied those at the top, the masses of workers and peasants were attracted to Islamic-oriented parties.

The success of the Islamic parties in the 1990s had its origins in the antileftist measures adopted during the 1980–1983 military intervention. Reasoning that greater exposure to religion would serve as a counterweight to leftist ideologies, the military High Command introduced compulsory courses on religion in the state-run primary and middle schools. In addition, it expanded the network of religious schools that trained students to carry out basic ulama functions such as leading prayers and preaching in mosques. These religious schools proved to be attractive sources of education and future jobs for children of lower-class families in central Anatolia, and by the early 1990s, such schools had an enrollment of approximately 300,000 students.

The attempt to create a safe Islamic outlet backfired in the 1990s, as the void created by the repression of the political Left was filled by reformist Islamic-oriented political groups that offered the only remaining challenge to the comfortable alliance between business interests and the existing political establishment. The largest and best organized of the Islamist parties was the Welfare Party, led by Necmettin Erbakan. Campaigning for the establishment of a just social order, the Welfare Party directed its message to the poor neighborhoods surrounding the major cities as well as to the small provincial cities.

The steady growth in support for the Welfare Party culminated in the 1995 national assembly elections, in which it received 21 percent of the popular vote, more than any other party in Turkey's fragmented political system. Erbakan became the prime minister in a coalition government and embarked on a program to emphasize the Islamic character of Turkey. He upset the secular establishment by his state visit to the Islamic Republic of Iran, his encouragement of women to wear head scarves, and his practice of appointing Islamist sympathizers to key positions in the bureaucracy. The foundational concept of secularism, one of Atatürk's principles, seemed in danger of being overturned. The military, which regarded itself as the guardian of Atatürk's legacy, did not stand idly by, and in 1997, the High Command pressured Erbakan into resigning. In 1998, the Constitutional Court, Turkey's highest judicial authority, decided to ban the Welfare Party and to bar seven of its members, including former Prime Minister Erbakan, from political activity for five years—a further attempt to drive Islamic organizations from the political arena.

In defending Atatürk's secular legacy, the military may have ignored another central principle of his heritage: democracy. While concentrating solely on its concerns for the proper role of Islam in a constitutionally defined secular state, the High Command was quite willing to overlook the equally critical question of the role of the military in a constitutionally defined democratic republic. Encroachments on civilian control over decision making became even starker in the state's response to Kurdish nationalist activities in the 1990s.

Kurdish Nationalism and the Turkish State: A Further Challenge to Democracy

A constant pattern running throughout the history of the Turkish Republic has been the conflict between the Kurdish desire for a form of cultural and political autonomy and the Turkish state's efforts to prevent that autonomy (see Chapter 10). Starting in 1984, the conflict reached a new level of intensity with a widespread Kurdish insurrection that the Turkish military met with an all-out show of force.

The mountainous oil-rich area that overlays parts of Turkey, Iraq, Iran, and Syria has for centuries been the homeland of the Kurdish people (see Map 25.1). In Turkey, the Kurds are the largest ethnic minority, numbering between 10 million and 12 million people, roughly 20 percent of the population. In southeastern Turkey, where the Kurds are concentrated, they form a majority. Their shared geographical space and distinct language have given them a sense of communal identity. From the time of Atatürk to the present, the Turkish state has endeavored to repress Kurdish identity by ignoring its existence. Official policy encouraged Kurds to assimilate into the dominant Turkish ethnicity, and most of those who did so were able to participate fully in government and politics. Those who did not were excluded from the national life of the state.

The insurrection that began in 1984 was organized by the Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK), a militant organization within the Kurdish nationalist movement. Although the PKK issued a range of minimal and maximal demands, its basic objective was to achieve effective Kurdish political and cultural autonomy within the framework and boundaries of the Turkish state. This vision involved a form of federalism in which Kurdish would be the language used in the school system, the courts, and the media. To achieve its goals, the PKK leadership endorsed terrorism as a legitimate tactic. Targeting such representatives of the state as schoolteachers, civil servants, and government buildings, the PKK engaged in a campaign of assassination and destruction that made normal life in the Kurdish provinces impossible. Businesses shut down, government operations came to a halt, and southeastern Turkey, already an impoverished region, became even further distanced from the prosperity enjoyed by the consuming classes of the large cities.

Successive governments in Ankara exacerbated the devastation of the Kurdish provinces by their determination to crush the insurgency, which, from their perspective, represented a threat to the integrity of the state and to the Kemalist legacy of a Turkish nation. Throughout the 1990s, the government placed most Kurdish regions under a state of emergency and allowed the military to undertake whatever measures they deemed necessary in the circumstances. Those measures were severe by any standard; they included the concentration of heavy firepower on civilian areas, the forced deportation of the inhabitants of entire villages, and the burning of vast areas of crops and forests. It has been estimated that by the late 1990s, the military had destroyed more than 2,300 Kurdish villages, and more than 2 million Kurds had fled or been forcibly relocated.

The threat to democratic principles was evident in the attitude of the military High Command toward the conduct of the Kurdish campaign. The military argued that the Kurdish issue was strictly a military problem and that only military means could resolve it. Exercising pressure within the political system, the military sought to persuade civilian politicians to give it a free hand in its campaign against the Kurds. These efforts were successful, and by the late 1990s, the High Command increasingly took charge of both policy and operations in matters involving the Kurds.

Turkey's Troubled Foreign Relations

Turkey's membership in NATO, its reliance on military and economic assistance from the West, its extensive trade with Western Europe, and its firm support for the allied coalition during the 1991 Gulf War underscored the close connection between the country's foreign relations and its economic development. Turkey's development strategies were oriented toward Western Europe, and its governing circles anticipated that it would become a full member of the European Union (EU), the unified economic bloc that was planning for expansion in the decade ahead. Turkey's military campaign against the Kurds and the domestic security measures that accompanied it, however, generated widespread European criticism that Turkey was engaged in human rights violations and that its democracy rested on shaky foundations. European economists also questioned whether Turkey's economy was sufficiently developed to enable the country to participate in the EU without large subsidies from the more prosperous member states.

In 1999, the tensions between Turkey's domestic policies and its aspirations for EU membership increased. Early in that year, a Turkish commando team captured the Kurdish PKK leader, Abdullah Öcalan, in Kenya. Öcalan was tried for treason and sentenced to death. During his trial, he adopted a conciliatory attitude and called for an end to the PKK uprising. The majority of his followers heeded his appeal and announced a unilateral cease-fire to be followed by a withdrawal of PKK forces from Turkey to bases in Iraq, Syria, and Iran. Life slowly returned to normal in the Kurdish urban areas, and the possibility seemed to exist for a durable compromise on the issues dividing the PKK and the Turkish government. At this point, the newly elected government of Prime Minister Bülent Ecevit faced an Öcalan dilemma: Although popular opinion within Turkey was heavily in favor of the PKK leader's execution, EU members warned that Turkey's use of the death penalty would again raise questions about its human rights record and could damage its application for membership in the EU, which had made the abolition of capital punishment a condition of membership for any new applicant state.

The festering Cyprus question also troubled Turkey's regional relations and its reputation in Europe (see Chapter 14). The prospect of Cyprus's joining the EU motivated another round of intensive UN-sponsored negotiations between the leaders of the Greek Cypriot and Turkish Cypriot communities to reach an agreement to reunite the divided island. But the failure to reach an agreement by 2003 dashed hopes that the island could be reunited before entering the EU. The following year a referendum was held on a UN peace plan that Turkish Cypriots endorsed but Greek Cypriots voted down amid anger over inadequate compensation for the 1974 refugees and concern over the number of Turkish troops allowed to stay.

The island remained divided when it joined the EU later in 2004, and Turkish Cypriots were excluded from membership.

The Return of Political Islam

As much as the Turkish military High Command sought, beginning in the 1980s, to limit the spread of Islamic-oriented political activity, the officers ultimately could not control the sentiments of the Turkish population. In a stunning electoral victory in the fall of 2002, the Justice and Development Party (AKP), headed by Recep Tayyip Erdogan, took 363 of the 550 seats in the national assembly. The Republican People's Party won 178 seats, and independent candidates took 9 seats. Within the course of a single campaign, Turkey's factionalized multiparty system was transformed. In rejecting the established parties, the Turkish people sought an end to the economic and political uncertainty of the 1990s. They found the AKP's platform of social welfare reform attractive, especially given its moderate Islamic orientation. However, the AKP's Islamic complexion caused the military establishment and the country's defeated secular politicians the most concern. The AKP claimed to be a secular party with Islamic roots, and Erdogan stated that, under his government, freedom of speech and religion would be enhanced. Yet there remained the undeniable fact that Erdogan had been arrested for "Islamist sedition" after reading an Islamist poem at a political rally in 1997.

The early years of AKP rule witnessed numerous achievements. In sharp contrast to the economic instability of the 1990s, Erdogan governed over a stable period of strong economic growth. Powered by massive government investment in infrastructure across the country but especially in the central heartland, a new crop of devout entrepreneurs known as the Anatolian tigers emerged. Regionally, Ankara turned its attention to expanding trade links with Arab states and mediating disputes as part of a policy referred to as "zero problems with neighbors." In the international arena, Erdogan initially placed great importance on Turkey's future membership in the EU and took steps to accelerate the country's entry into that body. Unlike his Islamist predecessor, Erbakan, whose first state visit was to Iran, Erdogan launched a tour of European capitals shortly after his party came to power, and he backed the 2004 UN peace plan for Cyprus. Erdogan's efforts were rewarded with the launching of negotiations in October 2005 for Turkey's EU membership. But the negotiations were far from smooth. Some member states of the EU—an organization that boasted of how its much-vaunted enlargement sustained the expansion of democracy into new areas—became more firmly opposed than ever to Turkey's membership. The depth of hostility revealed in the voices of a few EU politicians, especially leaders in France and Germany, reinforced public and political doubts in Turkey itself about what exactly the EU was willing to offer.

These growing suspicions may have contributed to a significant loss of momentum in Erdogan's reform drive, but it is worth acknowledging the success, if temporary, of two important initiatives Erdogan took. Firstly, Erdogan made tangible progress toward reconciliation with Turkey's Kurdish minority by permitting teachers and broadcasting stations to use the Kurdish language and by investing in economic and cultural initiatives for Kurdish communities. Moreover, he shepherded a peace process intended to end the long-standing conflict. In late December 2012, successful negotiations between Erdogan and Öcalan opened the door for a historic agreement between Turks and Kurds. The tentative deal promised that the current constitution, prepared by the generals following their 1980 coup, would be superseded by one that responded to the Kurds' demands, including nullifying the article declaring that all citizens are "Turks." Secondly, Erdogan drew on his party's popular backing to curb the Turkish military's self-appointed role as guardian of Atatürk's legacy. Thanks to a series of court cases that placed on trial a group of generals involved in some shadowy military plots against the AKP government, by 2015, the army effectively lost much of its image as a neutral arbiter of Turkish politics.

Erdogan's achievements as prime minister not only assured him a remarkable run of electoral victories from 2003 to 2014, when he was elected president, but also appeared to set him on the path of becoming Turkey's most transformative leader since Atatürk. Indeed, when uprisings erupted across the Arab world in 2011, Turkey was widely hailed as the political and economic model its Arab neighbors should follow. More recently, however, Erdogan's rule has been increasingly criticized for overcentralizing power and overreaching its authority. The AKP Party remains a popular party, especially in the Anatolian heartland where it is indeed appreciated for what its name promises. Yet after more than a decade of the AKP government in power, there have been growing displays of anger at the country's movement toward "elected authoritarianism."

The demonstrations at Gezi Park in Istanbul in May 2013 marked the major political turning point. They began with a peaceful sit-in to block a shopping arcade from being built on one of the city's few remaining parks. This protest was the first major expression of the rising resentment at the way the AKP government and those close to the regime were ramming through major urban construction projects with little to no local consultation. The government's subsequent brutal crackdown was a most frightening manifestation of Erdogan's increasingly high-handed and polarizing rule. Nationwide demonstrations followed in which a dozen people were killed and thousands were injured and arrested. Later that year, protests intensified in response to corruption probes that implicated key AKP officials, including Erdogan's own son, in money laundering and suspect business deals. This resentment erupted again into angry demonstrations in May 2014 when over 300 miners perished in an explosion in the town of Soma. One of the worst industrial accidents in the country's history, it raised questions about the workers' perilous labor conditions and the government's cozy relationship with newly privatized mining firms. Events took a particularly shocking turn when, during a visit to the mine, Erdogan and members of his entourage were themselves caught on camera attacking angry locals.

Once known for his adoption of conciliatory positions, Erdogan acquired, in the wake of these crises and scandals, a reputation for paranoid and authoritarian behavior. Showing an increased sensitivity to public criticism similar to the Menderes regime of the 1950s, Erdogan introduced a series of repressive measures, initiating a campaign trying to ban social media, tightening control over the judiciary, and expanding the powers of the intelligence services. Under Erdogan's watch, a record number of journalists were imprisoned. Even his earlier initiatives against the military came to be viewed in a new light, as reports of doctored evidence in the court cases emerged. When he stepped down as prime minister in 2014, only to be elected president, he began discussing plans for strengthening the powers of his new position so as to continue to run the country from the new, opulent presidential palace he had personally helped plan.

Erdogan's situation was also made more difficult by the fact that the ups and downs of his reform efforts unfolded under the shadow of the regional crises that erupted in the wake of the 2011 Arab uprisings. Erdogan was forced to confront some challenging foreign policy issues, chief among them the resurgence of attacks by PKK separatists. The government's conflict with the PKK has been long-standing, but this time the divergent interests of the various actors involved in Syria's descent into civil war in 2011 sharpened the dilemma over how to respond. The complexities of the threats posed by the overlapping Syrian and Iraqi conflicts will be explored in the next two chapters. The main fallout that concerns us here is the damage done to Erdogan's efforts to provide Turkey's repressed Kurdish minority with greater self-governing space. In 2012, when Syrian President Bashar al-Assad pulled his forces out of his own country's Kurdish enclaves along the Turkish border, Syrian Kurdish factions affiliated with PKK insurgents exercised increasing control. Erdogan, clearly unsettled by this development, appeared to take advantage of the regional turmoil as a cover for reigniting the war against the PKK. Thus, not only did his much-vaunted peace talks with Öcalan collapse; the PKK also resumed its violent insurgency within Turkey. Subsequently the Turkish army has again been given a free hand to unleash its might against purported enemies of the state.

Once widely admired for his promise to build new democratic institutions that would resolve tensions in Turkish society, Erdogan's increasingly divisive leadership was now feared for its deeply polarizing effects. Where his loyal supporters saw a devout and nationalist leader with a strong and steady hand to see Turkey through turbulent times, his critics condemned an increasingly authoritarian ruler prepared to overpower the remaining checks and balances of Turkey's democracy.

Iran in the 1990s

In the 1990s, while the political opposition in Turkey successfully expressed itself in Islamic terms, a different pattern emerged in Iran.

Secular behavior and an admiration for Western popular culture became the means by which segments of the urban population expressed resentment at the intrusive Islamization policies of the government.

In the years following Ayatollah Khomeini's death in 1989, popular pressure and economic necessity compelled the regime to moderate some of its policies. Khomeini's successor as supreme Islamic jurist, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, and Iran's president, Ali Akbar Rafsanjani (1989–1997), formed an uneasy alliance through which they attempted to prevent the more radical ulama from gaining greater control of the state. In 1989, they engineered a series of constitutional amendments that eliminated the post of prime minister and increased the scope of presidential authority. The amendments did not, however, diminish the power of the supreme Islamic jurist, who retained ultimate authority over the armed forces, the making of war and peace, and the direction of foreign policy as well as the right to intervene in the domestic legislative process whenever he chose.

With the backing of the supreme jurist, President Rafsanjani introduced modifications in Iran's domestic and foreign policies. The deteriorating economic situation caused the greatest hardships among the urban poor and the lower middle classes, the very groups that had composed the regime's original base of popular support. Rafsanjani sought to restore confidence in the government by privatizing companies that had been nationalized in the first years of the Islamic Republic and bringing in qualified technocrats to manage the economy.

Economic necessity also drove the government's attempts to end the country's diplomatic isolation. During the Gulf crisis of 1990–1991, Iran reestablished diplomatic relations with Saudi Arabia and endeavored to improve its regional reputation with assertions that its revolution was not exportable. In a major departure from Khomeini's policies, the government applied for a loan from the International Monetary Fund and encouraged foreign investment.

The changes Rafsanjani and his supporters introduced were met with resistance and intensified the struggle over the future direction of the Islamic Republic. On one side were ulama like Rafsanjani, who were committed to the survival of the Islamic Republic but sought to reorient the government's policies to accommodate the realities of a global economy and the demands of efficient government. Opposing them were groups of radical ulama who wished to deepen the Islamization of society, to perpetuate their control of government, and to ensure that the constitutional prerogatives of the supreme Islamic jurist remained intact. The contest between these clashing viewpoints was played out in the Majlis, which became an important arena for the airing of diverse opinions. Because Majlis sessions were broadcast live on the radio, they provided the population with one of its few opportunities to hear public opposition to the government and open disagreement on a range of economic and social issues. This contributed to popular awareness that the government's positions need not go unchallenged and that dissent was present even within the ranks of the ulama.

President Rafsanjani's economic opening to the outside world and his government's more relaxed enforcement of some of the regulations on social behavior were in part responses to popular disillusionment with the performance of the ulama as rulers of the country. The extent of this disillusionment was given full expression in the presidential elections of 1997.

In those elections, the government's candidate for president, who was backed by the supreme Islamic jurist, suffered a resounding defeat at the hands of an independent candidate, Muhammad Khatami (1997–2005). Khatami was a religious scholar who had campaigned on a platform of tolerance, social reform, and a greater role for women in public life. His victory was a stinging rebuke of the regime; he received 69 percent of the vote and had particularly strong support from two segments of the population who felt excluded by the practices of the Islamic Republic: youth and women. Too young to have experienced the shah's regime or the revolution that overthrew it, the youth resented the restrictions that government-imposed Islamization brought to their daily lives. They objected to the social codes that classified any public contact between unrelated men and women as a violation of public morality, and they detested the nightly patrols of police and religious vigilantes, who roamed the urban quarters searching for people listening to forbidden Western music or watching imported videos or satellite television.

Although Khatami was a member of the ulama, he was an exceptionally worldly one. His education had included not only the customary courses in theological studies at Qum but also university degrees in philosophy and education. Like many of the reformist ulama, he was committed to the concept of the Islamic Republic and to preserving an Islamic frame of reference in political and social life. But he recognized that in order to sustain the gains of the revolution, it was necessary to broaden the appeal of the Islamic Republic by winning the support of the groups dissatisfied with its policies. During his first term in office, he enjoyed a modest degree of success in securing greater freedom of the press and media and in restraining the activities of the units that enforced social morality codes. As Khatami attempted to broaden his base of popular support, he became locked in a political struggle with the entrenched radical ulama, who did not wish to lose their grip on power and the access to material benefits that it brought. This struggle, as with so much of the politics of the Islamic Republic, was reflected in the differing views that Khatami and his opponents held toward Iranian-US relations. (See Chapter 25 for discussion of US attempts to contain and sanction Iran.)

The growing popular dissatisfaction with the ruling elite found expression in the parliamentary elections of 2000, when reformist candidates won two-thirds of the Majlis seats. The pro reform vote was once again especially driven by women and young adults seeking economic improvement, greater freedom of speech, and a reduced role for religious law in social affairs. Even with a parliamentary majority in favor of change, however, President Khatami proved unable to implement the reformist legislation his supporters expected. A major problem for the reformers was the conservative backlash that the 2000 elections generated. Supreme Islamic jurist Khamenei used his authority over the judiciary, the broadcast media, and the paramilitary organizations to close reformist newspapers, arrest opposition journalists and intellectuals, break up pro reform student demonstrations, and block Majlis proposals to modify existing laws. In this uneven contest, the competing authoritarian and democratic tendencies embedded in the constitution were on full display. The reformists claimed that as democratically elected parliamentarians, they represented the wishes of the people for a more tolerant and less authoritarian state. At the same time, as noted in Chapter 18, the constitution empowered the twelve-member Council of Guardians to ensure that all laws passed by the Majlis conformed to Islamic principles. In many instances during the Khatami presidency, the council prioritized political expediency over Islamic principles. Additional veto power rested with the supreme Islamic jurist, who could override even the decisions of the Council of Guardians. Under these constitutional restrictions, it was impossible for Khatami and his supporters to push through laws limiting the power of the appointed officials. Khatami was a cautious reformer who wished to work within the system of the Islamic republic, but that very system was designed to thwart the changes he sought to introduce.

Despite Khatami's ultimate lack of success in both the political and economic spheres, he won a landslide victory in the presidential elections of 2001. The old pillars of the regime reacted to Khatami's victory by adopting a policy of repression that was even more extensive than the one that had followed the Majlis elections a year earlier. Arrests, newspaper closures, and the encouragement of vigilante violence were among the regime's weapons. These repressive actions further widened the gap between the popularly elected president and the Majlis, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, the closed, self-selective circle of ulama who controlled the central levers of power and determined the official policy of the state.

The Ahmadinejad Presidency and the 2009 Election Protests

The 2004 parliamentary elections dashed hopes that political change from within the system could successfully bridge this gap. The Council of Guardians forcefully retook control of the Majlis for Iran's conservatives by disqualifying more than 2,000 reformist candidates. Khatami's reform movement was already suffering from growing public disillusionment with its inclination to compromise; this stroke of the Guardians' pen all but buried it. Not surprisingly, voter turnout in 2004 was at a historic low, especially among the youth who had twice helped sweep Khatami to power. This time, many Iranians stayed home either in protest of the electoral manipulation or out of weariness with the political inertia and the interminable power struggle between reformists and conservatives.

Benefiting simultaneously from the aggressive attitude of the George W. Bush administration and the breakdown of Khatami's nuclear negotiations, the conservatives capped their takeover of Iran's political institutions with victory in the 2005 presidential elections. Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, a former mayor of Tehran with a populist streak and a reputation for piety and austerity, was the first noncleric president in twenty-four years. He surprised everyone by leapfrogging over some of the country's elder statesmen and scoring a landslide victory with a campaign that focused on widespread frustration with the reformers' failure to address socioeconomic problems. Although the vocally defiant forty-nine-year-old would soon become a highly controversial figure on the world stage, his presidential victory actually had little to do with foreign policy. Much of Iran's increasingly restive population, including its burgeoning young labor force, was primarily impatient for quick implementation of Ahmadinejad's pledges to cut living costs and to distribute more of the nation's oil wealth to the people's dining room tables.

But such promises were not easily delivered. President Ahmadinejad accrued a certain amount of public goodwill on his tours through rural areas by distributing funds for provincial development projects. He also consolidated his position by handing over billions of dollars worth of state assets to the loyal Revolutionary Guards. Booming oil prices during his tenure facilitated greater expenditure on public programs. However, finding ways to inject new funds into the Iranian economy without exacerbating inflationary pressures proved difficult for such an inexperienced leader, and in time, Ahmadinejad's economic policies faced mounting criticism across the spectrum. Business circles became particularly concerned at the erosion of the oil stabilization fund, the purpose of which had been to guard against the possibility of lower oil prices in the future. Ahmadinejad's presidency also came under heavy scrutiny in the international media, particularly as a result of his provocative denunciations of Israel and his sharp strengthening of Iran's nuclear power capabilities.

Although Ahmadinejad's actions greatly alarmed neighboring regimes and brought censure from the international community, the reaction inside Iran was more nuanced. Whereas the president played a major role in the administration and could strongly influence larger political debates, the regime was not monolithic, and the most important decisions remained with the collective leadership headed by supreme Islamic jurist Khamenei. True, the clerical leadership's disqualification of hundreds of reformist candidates in the parliamentary elections ensured that the contested debates really were contests only among conservatives themselves. Yet the divisions in viewpoints and tendencies could still be sharp. For their part, most young Iranians yearned for normality and clearly still valued their votes as potential instruments of change.

The growing tensions erupted in 2009 in the biggest challenge the Islamic Republic had faced since its founding thirty years earlier. In the presidential elections held in June, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad won a landslide victory amid allegations of vote rigging. Observers of the disputed elections referred to the process as a palace coup orchestrated by Ahmadinejad's loyalists among the regime and the military establishment. Popular protests against the election results gathered momentum, first under the slogan "Where is my vote?" and then under the banner of the Green Movement, taking its name from the campaign symbol for Mir Hossein Mousavi, Ahmadinejad's main challenger. This movement erupted first among professionals and the educated middle class but then became much more widespread, with trade unions and the working class all engaged. Compared to previous reform movements in Iran's contemporary history, which tended to rally around individual leaders, the Green Movement stood out for its reliance on social networks. The mobilization of antiregime demonstrators was empowered by the youths' ability to circumvent the official restrictions on modern communications networks and sustained by the co-option of official occasions for protest purposes. Despite the harsh crackdown, the protests soon transformed into a resilient confrontation with the theocratic regime itself.

In the following weeks, the regime was able to crush the reformist Green Movement, but not before suffering a grave loss of legitimacy. And the long-marginalized reformist opposition did not give up. Four years later, it celebrated the election of its own presidential candidate, Hassan Rouhani, who studied law at Glasgow Caledonian University and was a former chief nuclear negotiator under Khatami's presidency. During the 2013 presidential campaign, Rouhani spoke frequently of the need to bring moderation and transparency to the Iranian economy, which by then was suffering terribly under the mismanagement and corruption of Ahmadinejad's presidency and under the crippling impact of international sanctions. Rouhani promised to bring down inflation and stabilize the currency and aimed to reduce tensions with the West. Some commentators noted that his presidential cabinet had more Western-trained PhDs than Barack Obama's did. Rouhani quickly tasked his foreign minister, Muhammed Javad Zarif, to resume nuclear talks with the so-called P5+1 (the five permanent members of the UN Security Council plus Germany). During months of roller-coaster negotiations, he frequently held bilateral meetings with US Secretary of State John Kerry in a process that represented a remarkable diplomatic opening, given that their two countries had had no diplomatic ties for more than three decades. By the terms of the deal announced in 2015 (the details of which will be explained in Chapter 25), Iran basically agreed to end controversial parts of its nuclear program in exchange for relief from economic sanctions.

Although Rouhani and Zarif received the support of the Supreme Leader Ali Khamenei, throughout the negotiations, the nuclear agreement immediately brought to the surface simmering pressures for change in Iran. Khamenei himself saw negotiations as a way to consolidate the revolutionary regime. Following the 2009 protests, Khamenei recognized that a young population (those under thirty had not even been born when the shah was toppled) was more concerned for economic opportunities than inspired by the Islamist ideals of the 1979 revolution. But it was also clear that Khamenei meant to limit the deal's potential to bring Iran into a wider political reconciliation with the West. Rouhani, however, seemed hopeful that the negotiations could usher in a broader reconciliation. Expectations among the Iranian people, thousands of whom celebrated the deal, were huge.

Still, great challenges face Iran. To be sure, sanctions relief is expected to release tens of billions of dollars of frozen assets abroad and to allow for a massive increase in oil exports—admittedly amidst a glut in the global market. Nonetheless, Iran's infrastructure is in desperate need of investment, oil prices have plunged, and chronic corruption and stifling bureaucracy remain huge hindrances to foreign investment. The hardliners, many of whom had successfully expanded their control over the economy during the Ahmadinejad years, are pushing back, arresting journalists and rallying against US and Saudi attempts to assert hegemony over the region. Conservatives' evident desire to destabilize the political atmosphere may mean that they will try to capitalize on threats to national security and to slow the pace of change under Rouhani so as to increase general disillusionment with him—following a similar script to the one used to undermine Khatami a decade earlier.

HIZBULLAH AND THE STRUGGLE FOR LEBANON

In Lebanon, the effectiveness of the Shi‘a Islamist opposition in delivering social services was combined with military capabilities that were shaped by a particular set of geopolitical factors. Since the 1990s, tensions have escalated between the government of Lebanon and Hizbulah, the leading Shi‘a party, which represents the country’s largest but historically most disenfranchised minority. Hizbulah was the only group that retained its arms after the 1975–1989 civil war, a distinction it achieved by positioning itself as Lebanon’s “resistance” to Israel’s continued occupation in the south. Under its leader, Sayyed Hassan Nasrallah, Hizbulah developed a political front alongside its military operations. In doing so, it faced a difficult balancing act as it sought to reconcile its role as a militia, supported by Syria and Iran, with its participation in the Lebanese constitutional structure as a legitimate national political party. Two events in the early twenty-first century threw into sharp relief the destabilizing implications of Nasrallah’s ambiguous position. The shocking assassination in February 2005 of Rafiq al-Hariri, a former Sunni prime minister (1992–1998, 2002–2004), and Israel’s devastating war against Hizbulah in the summer of 2006 together intensified the political divide in Lebanon to a degree not seen since the signing of the Taif Accord ended the fifteen-year civil war.

Lebanon Under the Taif Accord

The conclusion of the civil war never really resolved the multilayered and tangled internal divisions between Lebanon’s many sects (see Chapter 19). The revised political system the warring factions drew up in 1989 at Taif, Saudi Arabia, was one that allotted political offices on the basis of an equal number of seats between Christians and Muslims as opposed to the preexisting six-to-five ratio favoring Christians. Although the Taif Accord did acknowledge the existence in Lebanese affairs of a special position of influence for Syria, the accord nevertheless also set the stage for a reinvigoration of democratic practices.

The 1990s witnessed a series of national elections that regularly elected parliaments to four-year terms as stipulated by the constitution, despite criticism of the persistent gerrymandering of political constituencies. The success of the electoral process was in part secured by Hizbullah's participation. As one of the country's best-organized political parties, it consistently won and retained approximately 10 percent of the seats in the Lebanese legislature. In these elections, the country's Muslim communities generally fell in line behind their representative leaders. Among Shi'as, relations between Hizbullah and Amal remained cool throughout the 1990s but improved markedly as relations with the Sunnis became strained. The Sunni community also generally enjoyed a unified leadership, whereas the Christian Lebanese encountered notable problems in resolving the question of political representation.

Although the mechanisms of the Taif Accord reaffirmed religious identity at the core of Lebanese politics, the domestic responses to the challenges faced by Lebanon since the end of the civil war were not always sectarian; rather, the main battle has been between contrasting visions of Lebanon's role in the region. On the one hand was the goal, pursued most fervently by Rafiq Hariri, the Sunni prime minister who led Lebanon for most of the early post-civil war years, to rebuild Beirut as a glittering cosmopolitan metropolis on the eastern Mediterranean. Harkening back to the days when Lebanese businessmen played a pivotal role as an economic bridge between the Middle East and the West, Hariri sought to improve relations with France and the United States as well as with the oil-rich Gulf states where he had built his own billion-dollar fortune. Inherent in this vision was a certain antipathy to state control: A laissez-faire economic system was seen as necessary for encouraging the movement of foreign capital into the country. Hariri rebuilt central Beirut as an attractive tourist destination, but this did little to help most Lebanese. Ultimately, however, he signally failed to construct a national project capable of remolding the country's confessional politics.

Hariri was opposed by a competing vision for Lebanon that saw the country as confronting certain enemies from which it needed protection. Although Hizbullah certainly held this vision, the main political representative of this position was the pro-Syrian Maronite president of the republic, Emile Lahoud (1998–2007), whose initial six-year term was extended by three years after Syria applied pressure to amend the terms of the Lebanese constitution. Hizballah scored a victory in May 2000 with the Israeli withdrawal from its so-called security zone south of the Litani River. But this was not an unambiguous victory for the movement in that the Israeli retreat also diluted Hizballah’s claim that Lebanon was a country in perpetual struggle against enemies. For this reason, the issue of the Shebaa farms—a disputed area that Israel continued to occupy close to the intersection of the Lebanese-Israeli-Syrian border—became an important cause for Hizballah insofar as it kept in the spotlight the country’s conflict with Israel, which considers the territory part of the Golan Heights. More generally, many Lebanese shared the view that Israel and the United States had embarked on a project of regional hegemony, evidence for which could be found in the growing number of conflicts emerging in the region early in the twenty-first century—in particular, the suppression of the second Palestinian intifada and the invasion of Iraq.

The Hariri Assassination and Hizballah’s War with Israel

A major turning point in this simmering battle of contrasting visions for the future of Lebanon occurred when a huge car bomb killed Rafiq Hariri on Valentine’s Day in 2005. Massive demonstrations in the streets of Beirut followed, as coalitions came together to support or oppose the al-Assad regime in Syria, which was widely blamed for the assassination. These demonstrations gave birth to two new factions, each named for the dates of their largest rallies.

On March 8, Hizballah’s leader, Hassan Nasrallah, called for demonstrations in support of Syria and protesting the increased domestic and international pressures on the Syrian government to withdraw from Lebanon. Nasrallah also rallied against the French- and US-sponsored UN Resolution 1559, passed in September 2004, which called for the disarmament of all militias as well as the removal of foreign forces. Counter-demonstrations were held days later, on March 14, when the streets of Beirut were filled with people protesting against the Syrian presence in Lebanon and calling for an investigation into Hariri's assassination. Parliamentary representatives, led by Walid Jumblatt (leader of the Druze minority), called for an "independence intifada" against Syria. In the minds of these protesters, Syria's military, which had first entered the country at the request of the Christians in 1976 and was subsequently called upon to help implement the Taif Accord in 1990, had clearly outstayed its welcome. Made up of an array of groups, including Sunnis, Druze, and some Christians, the March 14 coalition coalesced under the leadership of Hariri's son Saad. Their success in finally pressuring Syria into withdrawing its troops by April was widely celebrated as the "Cedar revolution." But it did little to forge a new shared vision for the future of the country.

Before long, the mostly Shi'a March 8 coalition grew wary of the mostly Sunni March 14 coalition, seeing it as a threat to Hizbulah's overall position in Lebanon. Shi'as were not particularly upset about the Syrians' departure, but they were embittered by the continued pressure to disarm and were more generally fearful about where the rapid rebalancing of regional forces might be leading. Hizbulah was able to reinforce its position following its war with Israel in the summer of 2006. On July 12, Hizbulah carried out an attack on the Israeli border, abducting two soldiers and killing eight. Nasrallah may have calculated that such an attack would coerce Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert into a straightforward prisoner exchange, but Olmert responded with an all-out attack on Hizbulah power. Variously called the July War or the Second Lebanon War, it resulted in over 1,000 Lebanese deaths (mostly civilian), with several thousand injured and a million displaced. Damage to the country's infrastructure was severe, with large numbers of unexploded munitions left on the ground after the fighting ended. In Israel, Hizbulah rockets killed 43 civilians and forced thousands to leave their homes; 117 Israeli Defense Force soldiers were killed in the invasion.

Despite those numbers, Hizbulah emerged from the bloody conflict claiming victory. They used the war to support the claims of the Shi'a population that their weapons were essential for defending Lebanon. Hizbulah's position appeared further justified by the United States' strong show of support for the intensive Israeli bombing campaign: Lebanese leaders who pushed for aligning their country more closely with the West were gravely undermined by US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's assessment of the war, celebrating the bloodshed as “the birth pangs of a new Middle East.”¹ Moreover, though Hizbulah suffered huge losses, the fact that its rockets rained down on Israel throughout the thirty-three days of fighting, showing no signs of slowing as the conflict dragged on, allowed them to claim that they fought Israel to a standstill. The aftermath of the war provided Hizbulah with a further opportunity to showcase its strength, as it quickly and effectively rebuilt damaged buildings and infrastructure. Hizbulah’s increased prestige challenged the Lebanese political structure. The war and its political aftermath heightened the growing polarization of the country between two largely sectarian groupings—the governing March 14 coalition of Sunnis, Druze, and most Christians on one side, and the opposition March 8 camp, consisting largely of Shi‘as, with some notable Christian allies and a few pro-Syrian leftists, on the other side—each accusing the other of being the stooge of outside powers. A major showdown came in May 2008, when the government moved to challenge important parts of Hizbulah’s security infrastructure. The political crisis was calmed by the efforts of the Qatari prime minister, Sheikh Hamad bin Jassem al-Thani, to negotiate a new compromise between the factions. Known as the Doha Agreement, it provided for the election of a new Maronite president but gave the Hizbulah-led opposition an effective veto over government policies.

Lebanon and the Syrian Civil War

Thanks to the de facto consensus to avoid a reprise of the civil war that wracked their own country from 1975 to 1989, the divided factions have largely been able to prevent spillover from the civil war that erupted in Syria in 2011 (see Chapter 26). But Hizbulah’s decision to align itself with the beleaguered regime of Syrian president Bashar al-Assad has exacerbated Lebanon’s political paralysis. The Hizbulah leadership’s decision to prop up its patrons in Damascus and thus ensure an essential arms network be kept open could have been considered a matter of survival. But images of its troops supporting al-Assad in his increasingly brutal fight against the antigovernment rebel fighters trying to overthrow him tarnished Hizbulah’s own image as a grassroots resistance movement. Furthermore, it undermined the movement's legitimacy as a conventional political party in Lebanon.

As Hizbullah became more stretched in Syria, its leadership became more concerned about simply reinforcing their own political position in Lebanon and cared less about whether the country's national institutions functioned effectively. A dangerous political deadlock emerged in Lebanon, marked by the quarrelling over an election law that resulted in the continual delay of parliamentary elections, disagreement on how to share offshore riches, and the increasingly corrupt and sectarian management of basic public services. When heaps of uncollected garbage piled up on the streets of Beirut in the summer of 2015, many commentators found the ultimate metaphor to describe the rot that underlay the dysfunctional political system: The nonsectarian civil campaign that expressed the disgruntlement at the government's failures took shape under the slogan "You stink!"

The Syrian war has also been responsible for one of the most dangerous humanitarian crises of recent history. By 2015, Lebanon was playing host to over 1 million Syrian refugees: One in five people in Lebanon was a Syrian refugee; over half of these were children. Dispersed throughout the country, most received no education, while many newborns had no citizenship certificates. Lacking both the national consensus and the civil infrastructure necessary to manage the situation, Lebanon's paralyzed government has had to struggle greatly to provide housing, health care, and employment opportunities. And there is no end in sight to the suffering.

CONCLUSION

More democratic than most states in the region, Turkey, Iran, and Lebanon all reveal the huge challenges Islamist political parties face in containing the conflicting forces at home when regional conflicts carry such powerful potential to play themselves out on local soil. Turkey, which underwent a successful transition from a single to a multiparty political system in 1950, found itself confronting political paralysis in the 1990s, ironically because of the existence of too many parties. The proliferation of parties reflected the mainstream political groupings' failure to satisfy popular aspirations. As a result, individuals gave their support to parties with more narrowly focused agendas, including Islamist organizations. With no party able to acquire a majority of seats in the national assembly, Turkey stumbled from one coalition government to another. The convincing victories of the Justice and Development Party in the 2000s returned the country to economic and political stability but soon raised questions about the limits that ought to be placed on majoritarian rule. Secular critics of the Islamist AKP government clearly feel beleaguered by Erdogan's increasingly authoritarian and contemptuous rule, including lecturing Turks on what to drink and how many babies to have. But most of the blame for the creeping authoritarianism lies with Erdogan's personal attempts to entrench himself in power and protect himself from the corruption scandals.

In Iran, no sooner had the battle over a nuclear agreement ended than a new contest for what it all meant for the future of the country had begun. The long-standing problems facing the ulama ruling elite in Iran remain similar to those that confront all of the regimes in the region: A restless young population, alienated by strict state control, economic mismanagement, and poor employment prospects, blamed the existing regime for denying them a future. To them, the government's failure to ensure economic well-being mattered more than its ideology. Although the reform forces in Iran sought greater moderation and transparency, they were not demanding an end to ulama control of government; the hard reality is that revolutionary Sh'ism has not fulfilled its promises of drastically improving the lives of those at the lower end of the economic scale, and for many in the middle and upper classes, the policies of the Islamic Republic will continue to be incompatible with the kinds of lives they wish to lead. In the minds of all Iranians, there still lies at the heart of the revolutionary state the uncomfortable paradox between the popular will and the will of God as represented by a divinely inspired clerical stratum.

Deeply scarred by sectarian divisions and treated by others as an arena for proxy war, Lebanon's governance problems cannot be traced to a lack of democratic freedom so much as a lack of political accountability. But the resilience of the Lebanese people, of all denominations, in resisting the spillover of communal violence from the Syrian civil war, adapting to the massive challenges posed by the influx of refugees, and uniting against government ineptitude shows that a complex and ever-changing situation cannot be reduced solely to crude sectarian divisions. But even as Lebanon's leaders have—so far—successfully avoided a descent into another civil conflict, they have also failed to build governance structures that can formulate the necessary policy responses to the myriad challenges the country faces. Though it is difficult to conceive of a resolution to Lebanon's constitutional predicament that does not involve broader regional settlements, the fragile sectarian puzzle that has made up Lebanese political life since the beginning must first be pieced together.

AMERICA'S TROUBLED MOMENT IN THE MIDDLE EAST

In making the United States the focus of this chapter, the aim is not to separate the subject from regional developments and internal power struggles in the Middle East; rather, it is to examine the potential of US policies to redirect established historical patterns of Middle Eastern politics and society in new and troubling directions. The chapter also seeks to place these developments in their proper historical context and so considers the legacy of certain American policies in the 1990s. The main topics examined in this section include the policy of dual containment in the Gulf through the imposition of a sanctions regime during the 1990s; the attacks on the Pentagon and the World Trade Center towers in New York on September 11, 2001; the US-led invasion and occupation of Iraq; and the nuclear negotiations with Iran. Although the United States' role has introduced new dynamics to the Middle East, it has also served to identify previously existing currents that are part of the connecting threads referred to in the conclusion of Chapter 26.

Just as the post-Ottoman era opened in the 1920s with Britain and France attempting to shape the Arab Middle East to serve their own interests, so did the post–cold war period begin with the United States seeking to do the same. The three pillars of US cold war policy toward the Middle East since the 1950s had been ensuring the security and prosperity of Israel, containing Soviet ambitions, and securing access to the petroleum resources of the oil-producing states. Although there may be much to criticize about the assumptions on which this policy was based and the ways and means through which it was pursued, there could be no question that in the aftermath of the Gulf War of 1991, America had emerged triumphant in its goals. With its dominance unrivaled, the question of how the United States would conduct itself and what it would consider to be its primary interests and responsibilities in the region became critically important. The basic parameters of post–cold war policy were set forth by President Bush senior in the immediate aftermath of the Gulf War of 1991 and were consolidated during President Clinton’s two terms in office (1993–2001).

Yet the first term of President Bush the younger (2001–2005) brought about an unprecedented enthusiasm for a political transformation of the Middle East. This shift, in part due to the composition of the younger Bush’s administration and in part due to the post–September 11 environment, was a dramatic one. In 2003, George W. Bush embarked upon regime change in Iraq, and in 2005, his secretary of state, Condoleezza Rice, denounced a sixty-year-old American foreign policy toward the Middle East that had “pursued stability at the expense of democracy” but achieved neither: “Now, we are taking a different course. We are supporting the democratic aspirations of all people.”¹ But Bush’s insistence at the same time on the prism of the “war on terrorism” through which all conflicts were understood became a source of much resentment. In Washington’s view, terrorists were simply terrorists, with minimal distinctions between al-Qa’ida and those groups involved in regional conflicts, such as Hizbullah and Hamas, who were more widely seen in the region as legitimate national resistance movements or as contenders in constitutional processes who, however reprehensible their tactics, needed to be engaged rather than defeated or excluded. The George W. Bush administration’s determination to ignore or sideline the Israeli-Palestinian conflict while enlisting the support of autocratic regimes in its campaign against terrorism only added to the resentment—and confusion. The defining moment of the Bush administration was the 2003 invasion of Iraq.

Intended as a massive show of American power, the invasion removed one dictator from the region and sought to intimidate rival authoritarian regimes, with a focus set squarely on Iran and Syria. Instead, the military action drained American foreign policy of credibility and respect as well as resources, and it destroyed Iraq. From the ruins of Iraq emerged a new splinter group of al-Qa‘ida, the Islamic State of Iraq and al-Sham (ISIS). While engaging in a deadly contest with its forebear in seeking recruits, ISIS sought, unlike al-Qa‘ida, to entrench itself as a self-proclaimed state on territory in both Iraq and Syria.

When Barack Obama took office in January 2009, he faced a number of complex and multifaceted challenges demanding urgent action at home, including the need to rescue the economy from a financial meltdown. In the Middle East, the promise to withdraw American forces and check Iran’s nuclear program competed for the president’s attention with a number of intractable problems, including the ongoing war in Afghanistan and the stalled Israeli-Palestinian peace process. Obama’s preference for international consensus and diplomacy over unilateral military action eventually resolved the tensions with Iran. But America was still living, well over a decade later, with the disastrous consequences of its invasion of Iraq.

THE POLICY OF DUAL CONTAINMENT

One of the primary objectives of the Gulf War of 1991 was to maintain access to Middle Eastern oil. The United States continued to pursue policies to this end throughout the 1990s but in a manner that differed markedly from the late cold war years. Instead of relying on a local power to serve as a surrogate enforcer of US Gulf policy, as it had done with the shah’s Iran before the revolution of 1979 and with Saddam Husayn’s Iraq during the Iran-Iraq War, the United States appointed itself as the protector of the Gulf. US ships patrolled the waters east of Suez, its warplanes made daily surveillance flights over Iraq, and its troops remained permanently stationed in the region.

This was part of a policy called dual containment, which represented US efforts to isolate both Iraq and Iran through tough economic sanctions against the former and more modest restrictions against the latter. To Washington, Iran represented a destabilizing force in the region, and until it modified its conduct, it was to be economically isolated. To keep Iran's revenues down, the US government barred American companies from undertaking any trading and investment activities in the country. This step was taken just as the political climate in Iran was changing (see "Turkey and Iran: Nations at a Crossroads" in Chapter 24) and the country was emerging from its self-imposed isolation and actively seeking foreign investment. US containment efforts against Iraq were much more aggressive than those used against Iran. Washington insisted on maintaining the crippling economic sanctions imposed in 1990 until Iraq was deemed to be in full compliance with UN Security Council Resolution 687, which called for the destruction, under international supervision, of Iraq's entire arsenal of chemical and biological weapons and the missiles capable of delivering them (see Chapter 22). The United States insisted that Iraq continued to possess undiscovered stores of weapons of mass destruction and that if the sanctions were lifted, Iraq would use its oil revenues to rearm and again become a threat to American stability in the Gulf.

Despite Iraq's lack of full cooperation, the United Nations Special Commission on Disarmament (UNSCOM) had managed to set up an elaborate monitoring system and had made substantial progress in its disarmament efforts. This came to an end in December 1998, when one of the periodic crises over UNSCOM's right of access escalated into armed conflict. The United States and Britain launched a concentrated three-day bombing campaign intended to weaken the Iraqi regime and produce the overthrow of Saddam Husayn. What had begun as a quick-strike mission turned into a destructive war of attrition that continued up to the US invasion of 2003. Although these air strikes severely crippled the Iraqi air defense system, the bombing campaign as a whole appeared to negate much of what the United States sought to achieve in the region.

For one thing, the UNSCOM monitoring system was destroyed, and Iraq refused to allow arms inspection units back into the country. This had serious implications for the future. The lack of reliable information-gathering devices on the ground allowed for the Bush administration, in its attempts to justify the invasion of 2003, to manipulate intelligence by exaggerating the extent of Iraq's arsenal of weapons of mass destruction. In addition, the bombing of Iraq was an embarrassment to America's Arab allies, particularly as Arab popular opinion openly reflected anger over the prolonged suffering of the Iraqi people. Dual containment was in itself a poorly conceived strategy, and its manifestation in the ceaseless bombing of Iraq revealed a bankrupt US policy that substituted force for diplomacy. However much Washington tried to blame Saddam Husayn for the confrontation, Arab public opinion saw little more than an imperious superpower unilaterally deploying its vast military arsenal against an Arab country while ignoring Israel's ongoing violations of the peace accords signed with the Palestinians.

AL-QA'IDA AND THE ATTACKS OF SEPTEMBER 11, 2001

September 11, 2001, also known as 9/11, has entered public discourse as an infamous benchmark of a changed world. On that day, nineteen men hijacked four commercial airliners and turned them into flying bombs. One of the planes crashed into the Pentagon, a second crashed into a field, and the other two smashed into the upper floors of the two World Trade Center towers in New York City. The death toll that day was more than 3,200, including the passengers of the four aircraft.

Shock mixed with outrage as the US public struggled to come to terms with the magnitude and significance of the events of that day. President Bush vowed to wage an all-out "war against terrorism" and to bring to justice the organizers of the mass murders. But who were they, and how were they to be discovered? Fifteen of the hijackers were of Saudi origin, the other four were Egyptian, and all were connected with a shadowy Islamic terrorist organization known as al-Qa'ida, headed by a wealthy Saudi expatriate, Osama bin Laden. Angered by what he perceived as an anti-Islamic foreign policy on the part of the United States and by the un-Islamic policies of the ruling elite in most Islamic countries, bin Laden had turned from a wealthy Saudi youth to austere and radical Muslim terrorist. Number two in the al-Qa'ida political hierarchy was Ayman al-Zawahiri, an Egyptian surgeon. Despairing of the failure of his Egyptian terrorist organization to topple the Mubarak regime in the 1990s, al-Zawahiri had reached the conclusion that an attack on the United States represented the surest way to defeat the atheist Egyptian government: Eliminate American support for the Middle East's corrupt rulers, and the regimes would fall.

Al-Qa'ida's base was located in Afghanistan, where the ruling Taliban regime sheltered bin Laden and permitted al-Qa'ida latitude for its organizational activities. The Taliban, which consolidated its control of most of Afghanistan during the period 1996 to 2000, came to power in the aftermath of a terrible civil war. It was a literalist Islamic regime that forbade female education, hanged television sets from trees, and generally followed a narrow and obscurantist interpretation of the faith, which it tried to impose throughout the country. In October 2001, President Bush launched the war against terrorism by authorizing a US-led invasion of Afghanistan designed to topple the regime, capture bin Laden, and set an example for other states that might harbor terrorist organizations. The international community widely supported this action, as some thirty-seven nations contributed troops or other forms of assistance.

The military campaign was successful in overthrowing the Taliban, but bin Laden remained at large. The United States and its allies installed a friendly regime in Kabul, but regional warlords retained much of their power, and major social and economic reforms were confined to the capital city. Blunt military force, especially American air power, had dispersed the Taliban and disrupted al-Qa'ida networks, but it had by no means destroyed them. By September 2003, the Taliban had regrouped and begun the first of several more rounds of fighting with the coalition forces. And the fact that foreign troops continued to occupy Afghanistan provided a ready-made rallying cry for the local resistance.

The most crucial link among September 11, al-Qa'ida, and the core Middle East can be traced to US foreign policy and perceptions of the United States itself. The attacks of September 11 gave rise to a brief period of US soul-searching in which the predominant question was "Why do they hate us?" It seemed to come as a surprise to many Americans that their country's policies could generate levels of anger and frustration sufficient to trigger such deadly retribution. Yet as we have seen elsewhere in this book, recent history reveals a pattern of US policy that was insensitive to and largely ignorant of Arab and Islamic public opinion. Bin Laden himself identified the following as causes of grievance: the US position on the Palestinian-Israeli conflict, continued US economic sanctions against Iraq and the hardships they imposed on the Iraqi people, and the presence of US troops in Saudi Arabia, which was seen as an insult to the holy cities of Mecca and Medina.

The first of these grievances generated the greatest anti-American backlash. Support for the Palestinian cause was deeply ingrained in the public consciousness of Arabs and Muslims. Although it is true that such sentiment was often exploited by embattled leaders seeking to shore up their regimes rather than to support the Palestinian cause, the presence of such easily tapped emotions was a significant factor in the rhetoric of anti-Americanism. They point to a larger issue of identity that has been embedded in the Arab and Muslim collective consciousness since 1948 and has been intensified since 1967. As Shibley Telhami observes, the occupied West Bank and Gaza Strip stand as “an open scar that is a reminder of a painful period in Arab history.”² In this inclusive sense, Arab and Muslim attitudes toward the conditions in the occupied Palestinian territories represent a demand for the end of the colonial era and a reaction against feelings of disempowerment.³

Al-Qa‘ida was a new phenomenon, a stateless international terrorist network that sought to establish an Islamic order along the lines of the Taliban government. Bin Laden’s ultimate objective was the overthrow of the Saudi and Egyptian regimes; his attack on the United States was calculated to generate an American military response that would outrage Arab and Muslim opinion and lead to popular uprisings against the US-supported rulers.

THE OCCUPATION OF IRAQ

By early 2002, the Bush administration had shifted its focus from al-Qa‘ida to Iraq as the most threatening source of anti-American terrorism. Although no evidence connected Iraq to the attacks of September 11, Bush and his advisers endeavored to make a case for preemptive military action against that country. Their two most frequently cited justifications were (1) Iraq’s alleged possession of weapons of mass destruction posed a threat to the United States and its allies because Saddam Husayn could place those weapons in the hands of international terrorist organizations such as al-

Qa‘ida; and (2) the promised benefits that regime change would bring for the Iraqi people themselves. Two additional factors, generally concealed at the time, were Iraq’s possession of one of the world’s largest oil reserves and a lingering resentment among the hawkish members of the Bush administration, several of whom had served Bush senior during the 1991 Gulf War, over the fact that Saddam Husayn remained a defiant symbol of the decision not to overthrow him a decade earlier. This resentment had expressed itself in 1998 in a famous letter addressed to President Clinton: The authors, referring to themselves as the Project for the New American Century, called for a more interventionist American foreign policy and urged in particular the ousting of Saddam Husayn.

In fall 2002, the UN Security Council passed Resolution 1441, stating that Iraq must disclose its weapons of mass destruction and allow unfettered access to all sites requested by the UN inspection teams. The resolution went on to warn that Iraq would face serious consequences if it failed to comply. During the weeks that followed, the Bush administration continued to insist that Iraq’s biological and chemical weapons programs constituted a danger to the United States and its allies, even though the newly installed UN inspection teams failed to uncover any conclusive evidence of the existence of such programs.

Despite this lack of evidence, it was apparent that the United States was determined to undertake military action against Iraq. In pushing its case for war, the Bush administration ignored its European allies and the United Nations. With the notable exception of the British government, which enthusiastically endorsed military action, Washington’s traditional NATO allies, especially France and Germany, refused to accept the notion that Saddam Husayn represented an immediate threat to world peace and should be overthrown by force. When it appeared that France would veto any Security Council resolution calling for an armed attack on Iraq, the United States unilaterally proclaimed Iraq to be in violation of Resolution 1441 and issued an ultimatum for Saddam Husayn and his two sons to give up power and leave Iraq within forty-eight hours. In response to these acts of US unilateralism, huge protest demonstrations were held throughout the world, and the sympathy the international community had shown the United States following the September 11 attacks began to dissipate.

On March 20, 2003, Operation Iraqi Freedom began with a massive bombing campaign and the simultaneous invasion of Iraq by American and British ground troops based in Kuwait. Iraq's oil facilities were quickly secured, though not without damage, and within three weeks, US armored columns entered Baghdad. The regime of Saddam Husayn was no more, though the fate of Husayn himself remained unknown until his highly publicized capture by US forces in December. On May 1, 2003, against a backdrop that featured a large banner reading "Mission Accomplished," President Bush declared the end of major combat operations.

As the Americans in Baghdad and the British in Basra would both soon discover, however, toppling a harsh regime was much easier than administering and defending the occupation of a country whose inhabitants were at best lukewarm and at worst hostile toward the forces that had "liberated" them. Though most Iraqis, except for a core group of mostly Sunni Arab supporters, celebrated the end of Saddam Husayn, they could not but see their liberation as an incidental justification for the invasion. The primary justification for the invasion, Iraq's possession of an arsenal of weapons of mass destruction, proved illusory. The failure of US inspection teams to find such weapons led to increasing criticism of the extent to which President Bush and Prime Minister Tony Blair had manipulated intelligence reports in order to gain support for the invasion.

The magnitude of the US failure to prepare for the postwar situation became evident in the escalating turmoil of summer 2003. To the neoconservative architects of the postwar occupation, Iraq became a laboratory for radical economic transformation. Their dogmatic commitment to free markets and privatization, even as firms favored by the US administration received huge no-bid contracts for projects in Iraq, blinded them to the realities of an economy laid prostrate by decades of wars and sanctions, systematically exploited by smugglers and racketeers, and barely held together by the overstretched safety nets of family and tribal bonds. By failing to deal quickly and realistically with Iraq's public security and economic stability, the American occupiers created a climate of impunity that started the country's descent into chaos. Insulated within an air-conditioned bubble, walled-off in the heart of Baghdad, known as the fortified "green zone," the occupying forces increasingly lost touch with the outside.

Sectarian Violence and Political Fragmentation

The anti-US insurgency first emerged among Iraqis angered at the presence of foreign troops on Iraqi soil. Scores more quickly joined out of despair and anger with the prevailing lack of security and employment. The ranks of potential recruits grew larger still when the occupying forces purged the government of former Ba‘thists and disbanded the Iraqi army, thereby throwing thousands of embittered, well-trained, and armed men onto the streets. The occupation’s iron-fisted approach continued to manufacture its own enemies; as General Ricardo Sanchez, the commander of US-led forces in Iraq, explained, “When you take a father in front of his family and put a bag over his head and put him on the ground, you have had a significant adverse effect on his dignity and respect in the eyes of his family.”⁴ The presence of tens of thousands of private security contractors who operated in a legal grey zone, immune from Iraqi law, together with the horrifying stories of prisoner abuse by American soldiers in the Abu Ghraib prison, further fueled the resistance to the occupation.

As the insurgency gathered steam, some Iraqis and foreign jihadists were attracted to a more extreme, religiously oriented attack on the US-led occupation. Although the Bush administration tried hard to portray the invasion of Iraq as part of its “war on terrorism,” it in fact provided al-Qa‘ida with valuable justification for recruiting a new generation of jihadis. In 2004, the Jordanian jihadist Abu Musab al-Zarqawi pledged allegiance to Osama bin Laden and created a new branch, called al-Qa‘ida in Iraq (AQI), which played a paramount role in provoking lethal sectarian violence. AQI killed American forces and members of the international community, including UN staff and aid workers, in brutal beheadings videotaped and circulated to the media. But the Iraqi Shi‘a community, viewed as apostates by Sunni extremists, also came under bloody attack. Sectarian killing intensified greatly after the February 2006 bombing of the golden-domed Askariyya shrine in Samarra, one of Shi‘a Islam’s holiest places. By 2007, the sectarian fighting, which at its apex witnessed whole neighborhoods being cleansed, had transcended the anti-US insurgency.

In January 2007, George W. Bush announced a key policy change as part of a projected “surge” in the number of US troops deployed in Iraq. Working closely with Sunni tribal elders who were repelled by the brutality and arrogance of al-Qa‘ida in Iraq, US forces paid Sunni tribes to work together in the fight against AQI cells operating in their towns and villages to the north and west of Baghdad. Known as Sahwa (the Awakening), this Sunni movement grew to over 100,000 men but developed largely outside of formal political structures. By 2008, Sahwa had succeeded in nearly stamping out AQI.

By this time, the cost of the insurgency and sectarian fighting was already incalculable. Iraq Body Count, a Web site that records monthly death tolls, concluded that by the end of June 2008, there had been between 85,000 and 93,000 deaths beyond normal mortality in Iraq since 2003 (out of a population of approximately 28 million). But these figures, based primarily on press reports, were widely regarded as an underestimate. The World Health Organization calculated in June 2006 that there were over 150,000 casualties of war. The huge variations reflect the difficulty and danger of collecting information in such an anarchic situation. But the debate over numbers was clearly also highly politicized, with the Pentagon regularly updating American military death statistics but not releasing any statistics on Iraqi casualties. In addition, the war caused massive population displacement: one in six Iraqis had fled their homes.

The steady collapse of state institutions accompanied the rising violence. When, in May 2003, the UN Security Council passed a resolution recognizing the United States and Britain as occupying powers in Iraq, President Bush immediately delegated much of that authority to L. Paul Bremer III. A former head of counterterrorism at the State Department, Bremer led what came to be known as the Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA). Bremer wanted national elections to await the promulgation of a constitution prescribing basic principles. But Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, who held no political post but whose unparalleled authority among Shi‘as in Iraq was quickly filling the political vacuum in ways Bremer failed to grasp, demanded that elected representatives write Iraq’s constitution and insisted that holding elections was the only legitimate way forward. In the end, the UN’s ability to adopt the role of an impartial arbiter garnered it enough legitimacy to select an interim government to whom the CPA finally transferred authority in summer 2004. This prepared the way for a series of elections the following year. In January 2005, in the first democratic elections in fifty years, Iraqis voted to elect a transitional national assembly. This body then wrote a new constitution, ratified in a referendum in October, following which Iraqis elected a national government under a new Shi'a prime minister, Nuri al-Maliki, who was sworn into office in 2006.

It is important to recognize that the political system that finally emerged from the Anglo-American invasion and occupation of Iraq, despite the success in holding national democratic elections throughout the country, was one that favored sectarian government over forging a new national consensus. Under the new electoral practices, reminiscent of Lebanon's confessional system, Shi'a and Kurdish leaders sought to consolidate power while the Sunni population felt increasingly marginalized. Fueled by the country's dependence on oil, politicians fought a divisive contest to tap into the revenues and use patronage-deploying ministries to build up their own authority. The potential for postoccupation disarray to threaten the territorial integrity of Iraq became ever more real.

In the northern mountainous areas where Iraq's 5 million Kurds are concentrated (see Map 25.1), the Kurdish leadership engaged primarily in consolidating its autonomous rule. In contrast to the bloody fighting elsewhere in the country, the Kurdish regional government based in Arbil carved out a zone of economic prosperity and relative political stability. Economic growth was driven mostly by high oil prices. But the production and marketing of oil was also the main source of tension with the Shi'a-led government in Baghdad, which insisted that it had sole authority to dispose of the nation's resources. Politically, the historic rivalry between the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan (PUK), led by the Talabani family, and the Kurdistan Democratic Party (KDP), loyal to the Barzani family, worked itself out by sharing the oil revenue relatively amicably (though each party still maintained their own peshmerga fighting units).

During this time, al-Maliki's divisive policies gave the Kurds' demand for autonomy extra impetus. Al-Maliki held an increasingly paranoid and authoritarian grip on power. He purged his opponents from political office and awarded loyalists with promotions and patronage. Prime Minister al-Maliki's aversion to fund Sunni groups, integrate them into the security forces, or provide them with alternative employment opportunities triggered a deepening sense of alienation and resentment. The Sahwa movement that was key in rooting out al-Qa'ida in Iraq was disbanded as soon as the Americans left. The persecution Sunnis faced both from the Iraqi army and from the growing number of independent Shi'a militias operating outside the official command exacerbated their grievances. As national institutions were hollowed out under al-Maliki, the rule of law became even worse than it had been under Saddam Husayn.

Meanwhile, the Iraqi government did negotiate a new relationship with the United States. With the UN mandate authorizing the presence of foreign troops in Iraq set to expire and given the widespread anger among all Iraqis over the lack of accountability and freedom of action enjoyed by US-led forces inside the country, Iraqi leaders were determined to regain full sovereignty. The Status of Forces Agreement (SOFA), signed in late 2008, required US troops to redeploy from cities and towns by June 30, 2009, a date that the Iraq government hailed as National Sovereignty Day.

The Rise of ISIS

The systematic marginalization of the Sunni community under the al-Maliki government paved the way for the Islamic State of Iraq and al-Sham (ISIS), a new Sunni jihadist organization, to take control of large swathes of Iraq in 2014. The group has been referred to by a confusing number of names, in part due to its several transformations over time. Because al-Sham is an Arabic, precolonial geographical term that refers to the Levant, or Greater Syria, the group is also commonly referred to as Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant, or ISIL. When ISIS captured a large amount of territory straddling the Iraq and Syria border in June 2014, its leaders began calling the movement the State of the Islamic Caliphate, or just the Islamic State (IS). Some observers refer to it as the “so-called Islamic State” to avoid granting it the respect of being designated either “Islamic” or a “state,” whereas others adopt the Arabic acronym for ISIS, Da'esh, a term that has gained currency for similar reasons and also because the group’s own supporters dislike the word’s harsh sound.

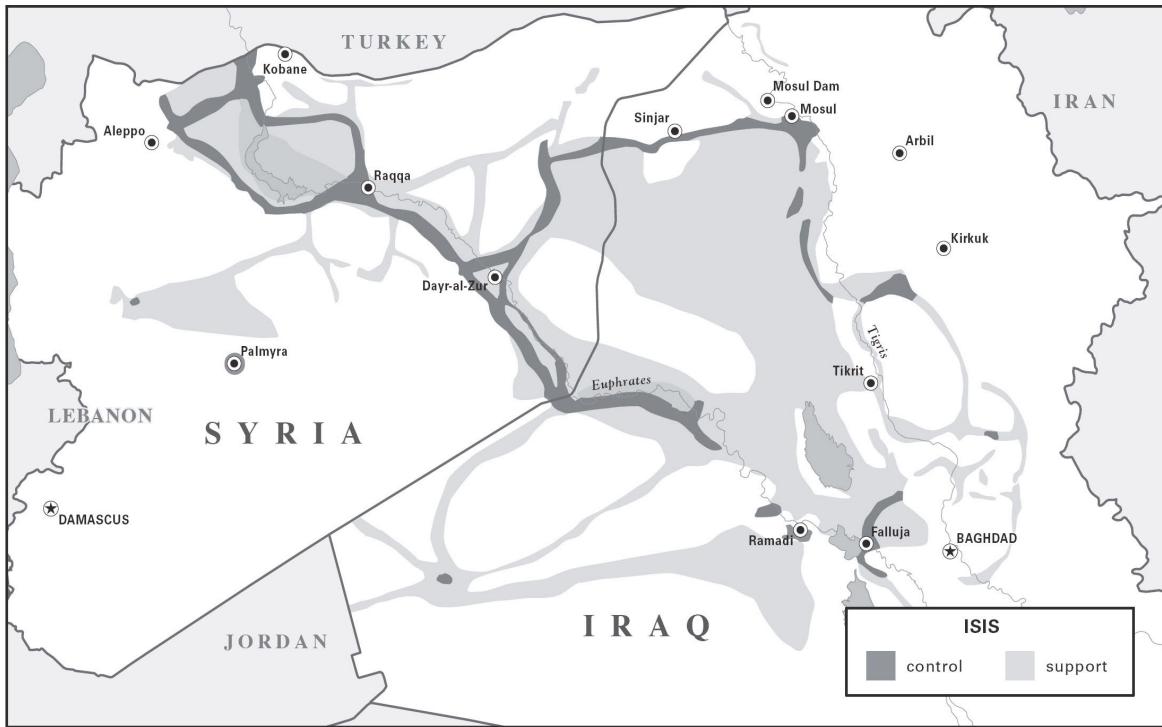

MAP 25.1. Kurdish homelands.

ISIS is the offspring of the remnants of al-Qa‘ida in Iraq that survived the Sahwa offensive. The torturous civil war that erupted in Syria in 2011 provided AQI enough cover to regroup as well as new ways to raise funds and recruit. With new opportunities in Syria, however, came dissension in the ranks of al-Qa‘ida over its political objectives. In defiance of the central al-Qa‘ida leadership’s goal of attacking the “far enemy” in the West, ISIS broke away in 2013 as a reconstituted group with the aim of defeating the “near enemy” (the regimes in Damascus and Baghdad) and building a self-proclaimed caliphate on the ground. ISIS’s leader, Abu Bakr al-Baghdadi, adopted highly organized and ruthless forms of warfare that fused conventional and terrorist fighting techniques. ISIS successfully attracted and mobilized more local and foreign recruits than any other militia in the Syrian civil war and eventually outfought all its rivals to become the dominant power in the northeastern province of Raqqqa.

From this base, ISIS launched itself back into Iraq in June 2014, charging down the Tigris valley toward Baghdad. The Iraqi army, gravely weakened by al-Maliki's corrupt and politicized governance, was completely routed, abandoning huge stockpiles of US-supplied arms and ammunition. The country's best-trained forces were the Kurdish peshmerga, who viewed their defense against ISIS attacks as a pivotal step toward independence. As ISIS fighters took control over substantial territory, including Iraq's second city, Mosul, they did so with the active or tacit support of large segments of the disgruntled and fearful local Sunni population (see Map 25.2). Iraqi Sunnis had become so resentful of the central government's brutal security apparatus and the myriad associated Shi'a militias that many saw ISIS as a necessary and expedient ally in the desperate struggle for resources and protection. ISIS benefited hugely from the resources they now controlled. In addition to looting bank vaults, selling antiquities, practicing extortion, and extracting ransom for hostages, ISIS built new administrative structures on the revenues it accrued from selling oil on the black market. Some estimates suggest that ISIS was earning $40 million a month.

With its wealth and its prestige from building a new state administration, ISIS attracted increasing numbers of foreign fighters, particularly radicalized young Muslims from across the Arab world but also from Europe and beyond. Some estimate the number of ISIS fighters to be between 30,000 and 45,000. However, its acquisition of territory roughly the size of Jordan and with an approximate population of 8 million also brought the responsibility of ruling. It was not clear whether ISIS would strive to become a quasi-state within defined borders or to continue to try to expand as its rhetoric proclaimed. The well-publicized brutality of ISIS rule, with gruesome killings conducted as a way to deter local resistance or to project its power and resolve, betrayed a certain insecurity with maintaining such a broad local constituency—something al-Qa'ida never had to worry about. The pledges of support ISIS received from other extremist groups, including from Libya and Egypt's Sinai Peninsula, is revealing in terms of the challenge ISIS poses to the wider region. The actual extent of the operational command ISIS exerts over other groups is not clear, but efforts taken by Arab regimes to combat these groups, if state security services themselves rely on brutal internal repression, may well create the sort of backlash ISIS is looking for.

MAP 25.2. The spread of ISIS, April 2015.

The humanitarian disasters that followed in the wake of ISIS's territorial expansion into Iraq, in particular the slaughter and enslavement of religious minorities, prompted an immediate military response from world powers. President Obama declared in September 2014 that he would "degrade and ultimately destroy" ISIS, but he also insisted that he would not commit US ground forces to a combat mission in the country from which, only three years earlier, he had withdrawn the last American soldiers. By the end of 2015, the overall effectiveness of air strikes was not readily apparent: Apart from disrupting oil sales and pushing ISIS forces back in some places, it is not clear how significantly ISIS forces on the ground have been weakened. It is also not clear whether the bombardment is actually compounding the very misery and sense of victimhood that allowed ISIS to take root in the first place or whether there is any strategic plan to ensure that the local Sunni population would welcome the political and economic aftermath as a preferable alternative to ISIS.

IRAN'S NUCLEAR PROGRAM

America's relations with Iran's theocratic regime have never been good, but during the period of George W. Bush's administration, they went from bad to worse. In 2002, Bush included Iran along with Iraq and North Korea on his "axis of evil" list. By March 2003, following the quick toppling of Saddam Husayn's regime, Iran found itself walled in between two American military occupations in Iraq and Afghanistan while there was talk in Washington suggesting Iran was next in line for "liberation." According to most observers, however, America's calamitous occupation of Iraq emboldened Iran: Saddam Husayn, with whom Iran had fought an eight-year war, was eliminated, and Iran's Shi'a allies were now in positions of leadership in Baghdad. In addition, the United States, Iran's archenemy for over a quarter of a century, was, in the eyes of supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, "stuck in a whirlpool."⁵

In Iran, the conservative hardliners who, in 2005, replaced Khatami's reform-minded administration resorted to more adversarial foreign policies reminiscent of the early revolutionary years. Khatami's successor, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, was as uninterested in showing a conciliatory face to the West as he was in continuing the liberalizing reforms at home. Ahmadinejad's adoption of a much more defiant posture on the international stage and his harsh denunciations of Israel raised the particular fear that Iran's nuclear program, the resumption of which coincided with Ahmadinejad's election, was not in fact peaceful. These developments fueled arguments in Washington—reminiscent of the lead-up to war against Iraq in 2002–2003—that the nuclear program needed to be preempted by military means.

Although there was little firm evidence that the Iranian regime was developing a nuclear weapons program, Tehran nonetheless failed to fully account for its nuclear activities. The hard part of making a nuclear bomb is the fuel enrichment process, and by 2008, Iran had over 3,000 centrifuges running in Natanz. Iran consistently denied that its aim was to build nuclear weapons, insisting that the centrifuges only enriched a low-grade uranium necessary for civilian power reactors to produce electricity (the production of bombs requires highly enriched uranium). The development of the nuclear industry was presented as a safeguard to the country's energy security—that is, as a step forward in planning for the day of depleted oil resources. More to the point, the development of a nuclear fuel cycle had become a matter of national honor. There was broad acceptance among the Iranian people of Ali Khamenei’s position that Iran would never give up its legal rights to peaceful nuclear technology under the terms of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, and general resentment grew as Iran was held to double standards that benefited the established nuclear arms powers, including Israel.

The increasing chaos of the American occupation in Iraq dampened President Bush’s enthusiasm for taking on the Iranian regime. It became abundantly clear that America was in no position to mount another invasion and that Iran, closely allied with the main actors in Iraq’s new political system, could make things much worse for American forces there—and in Afghanistan—if one were launched. Furthermore, an American—or Israeli—attack on Iran would enrage public opinion across the region, potentially send oil prices skyrocketing, kill the inspections regime that had been put in place to monitor Iran’s nuclear program, and most likely ensure that Iran would indeed push for new weapons capabilities. As soon as President Obama came into office, he made it clear that he would try to engage Iran diplomatically. In March 2009, Obama directly addressed both “the leaders of the Islamic Republic of Iran” and “the people” when marking the occasion of Nowruz, Iranian New Year; such acts represented an abrupt departure from the hostile rhetoric deployed by his predecessors, especially George W. Bush. However, the disputed results of Iran’s presidential election in June 2009 greatly complicated the promise of a “new day” in relations between Washington and Tehran. Protests against the election results returning Ahmadinejad to power transformed into resilient demonstrations against the theocratic regime itself (see Chapter 24) and threatened Obama’s policy of engagement with it. Obama faced pressure at home to denounce the Islamic Republic’s repressive actions and to scale down his earlier talk of extending it an open hand. But he also feared that actively supporting Iranian protesters would tar them as agents of foreign interference.

What eventually derailed Obama’s initial efforts at engagement was the revelation in late September 2009 of another uranium-enrichment plant, tunneled deep into mountains for protection against possible attack. Iran claimed that the construction was consistent with its ongoing efforts to produce low-enriched uranium for a civilian nuclear program. But Western officials were skeptical that Iran's enrichment program could be useful for anything other than producing weapons-grade material. Some analysts concluded that Iran was seeking "breakout" capability—that is, stopping short of actually constructing a nuclear weapon but setting in place the means to rapidly build one. Working with the other permanent members of the UN Security Council plus Germany—a group often referred to as the P5+1—President Obama faced an increasingly difficult challenge: How to concede that Iran would not surrender what it saw as its right to pursue peaceful nuclear technology while ensuring that Iran would not continue to produce a fuel stock that could in short order be converted into weapons-grade uranium?

During a period of mutual escalation that lasted until 2013, Iran steadily increased its nuclear program and built more centrifuges while the international community pressed for more crippling sanctions and Israel increased its threats of a unilateral attack. By the time Hassan Rouhani, Iran's centrist president, was elected in 2013, Iran had established 20,000 centrifuges and had built up a substantial stockpile of enriched uranium. Rouhani, a former chief nuclear negotiator, had campaigned on the promise of reduced tensions with the West. He quickly instructed his foreign minister, Muhammed Javad Zarif, to resume nuclear talks. Two years of tough, protracted negotiations followed—a remarkable diplomatic process marked by a new, respectful relationship between Zarif and US Secretary of State John Kerry. In mid-2015, a deal was announced, known as the Joint Comprehensive Plan of Action (JCPOA), in which Iran basically agreed to end controversial parts of its nuclear program in exchange for relief from the economic sanctions squeezing its economy.

This deal prevents Iran for fifteen years from producing the fissile material needed to "break out," and establish the capacity to construct a nuclear bomb, by cutting off Iran's two pathways to a nuclear weapon: uranium enrichment and its transformation into plutonium. There were four key elements to the deal. First, Iran reduced by 98 percent its stockpile of low-enriched uranium that could be processed into bomb-grade fuel. Second, Iran agreed to limit future enrichment capacity by reducing the number of operating centrifuges by two-thirds, to 5,000. Third, Iran poured concrete into its heavy-water reactor at Arak, destroying its capacity to produce weapons-grade plutonium. Fourth, Iran allowed for International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) officials to monitor any sites they like, civilian or military, if they suspect covert activities are being carried out. The IAEA are also permitted to monitor the supply chain supporting Iran's nuclear program. And if, at any point, Iran violates its obligations, the international economic sanctions that had crippled Iran's economy for more than a decade would be put back in place. Taken together, these measures ensure that, should Iran actually "break out" and make a dash for nuclear weapons capability, it would now take a year to produce the necessary weapons-grade fuel for even a single bomb.

This agreement came under stringent criticism from Obama's opponents in Congress as well America's allies in the region, most notably Saudi Arabia and Israel. There was anger that the deal failed to dismantle all of Iran's nuclear facilities and fear that lifting the sanctions would allow Iran to be a more aggressive actor in the region, principally through funding its allies in countries such as Syria, Lebanon, and Yemen. The heightened tension and mistrust between the United States and its own allies led Obama to announce a series of policies that deliberately scuttled any hopes that the nuclear deal might lead to a broader diplomatic engagement in the region. Obama expressed support for Saudi Arabia's military campaign in Yemen, despite evidence that the war was strengthening al-Qa'ida in Yemen and causing a humanitarian disaster. The United States also lifted arms restrictions on Bahrain and Egypt and turned a blind eye to their governments' repression of political dissent. Furthermore, Obama was in no position to hold Israeli prime minister Binyamin Netanyahu accountable for his strident attempts to undermine John Kerry's peace initiatives. As for future relations with Iran, Washington had squandered the opportunity to move US Middle East policy much beyond the twenty-year-old policy of containment.

CONCLUSION

At this point, the Bush and Obama administrations' contested policies and actions are too recent and Middle East politics too volatile and multilayered to permit full analytical reflection on long-term consequences and patterns.

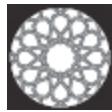

Washington retains a great deal of influence, evident in its many relationships with governments that continue to rely on and even jealously guard close strategic alliances with the United States. Nonetheless, there have been increasing indications that regional powers asserting themselves in an increasingly fractured environment may be contesting US hegemony more and more; for many observers, recent events have indicated a serious waning of American hegemony in the region. If nothing else, by now they should have clarified the limits of undertaking military action to achieve foreign policy goals. As David Gardner has observed, “It has always been a delusion in the Middle East that those who unleash violence believe they can control it.”⁶

Compared to his predecessor’s confrontational approach, President Obama’s promise of diplomatic engagement raised hopes as well as expectations throughout the Middle East. In June 2009, President Obama delivered a speech at Cairo University that was welcomed throughout the Middle East for heralding a new beginning in American foreign policy: Quoting Thomas Jefferson, he declared, “I hope that our wisdom will grow with our power and teach us that the less we use our power, the greater it will be.”

Addressing the issue of Iraq directly, Obama declared that America had a dual responsibility “to help Iraq forge a better future—and to leave Iraq to the Iraqis.” However, the Iraq the American occupation left behind—wracked by sectarian violence and political collapse—gave rise to ISIS, an organization even more militant than al-Qa‘ida. The defeat of ISIS, as much a symptom of the chaos in the region as a cause, clearly requires a political solution, including more inclusive and less centralized governments in Baghdad and Damascus. But Obama’s response has continued to rely heavily on military action, a fact crystallized when he became the fourth successive US president to bomb Iraq. To be sure, the Iranian nuclear deal marked a notable victory for diplomacy. Yet in so readily appeasing the concerns of US allies in the region, Obama’s final term also harkened back to the policies of containment in the early 1990s, when the United States embarked upon its troubled moment in the Middle East on the side of a repressive and authoritarian order, one that was loudly repudiated in protests that swept the region in 2011.

CHAPTER 26

THE 2011 ARAB UPRISINGS AND THEIR AFTERMATH

On December 17, 2010, a young Tunisian fruit seller set himself and the region afire. In front of the governor's office in the neglected town of Sidi Bouzid, the twenty-six-year-old Muhammed Bouazizi doused himself in gasoline and lit a match. His self-immolation was a protest against the misery of trying to make a living as a street vendor in Tunisia's informal economy. Earlier that day, Bouazizi had lacked the funds to pay a bribe to the local police and so was beaten and had his goods confiscated. This desperate one-man protest unleashed nationwide demonstrations against economic stagnation and official abuse. The Tunisian government, widely known for its nepotism and extortion, ordered the police and security services to repress the growing opposition. But this only fueled further protests. Although state media ignored the demonstrations, graphic images were captured on personal mobile phones, uploaded to the Internet, and then picked up by television stations such as al-Jazeera, the Qatar-based satellite channel that broadcasts across the Arab world. Within weeks, large crowds were marching in cities all over the country, proclaiming, "The people want the fall of the regime." With the mass demonstrations showing no signs of abating, the army was called in but refused the order to fire on the civilian population. President Zine El Abidine Ben Ali, who had ruled Tunisia for twenty-three years, saw the writing on the wall. On January 14, 2011, Ben Ali boarded a plane and took refuge in Saudi Arabia. His departure sent shock waves across the Middle East.

Over the course of 2011, the authoritarian order of the Middle East would be shaken by the angry protests Bouazizi's death sparked. Media coverage portrayed autocratic Arab regimes as falling dominoes fanning out from Tunisia. Indeed, by year's end, dictators in Egypt, Libya, and Yemen had been toppled. In Syria in 2012, as in Libya in 2011, the regime's desperate attempts to cling to power pushed the country into bloody and torturous civil wars. Meanwhile, most of the rich Gulf monarchies sought to buy time, taking advantage of the high oil prices to bribe their populations with subsidies while also clamping down on any signs of dissent. Saudi troops helped Bahrain to forcibly quell popular protests there.

The pace, process, and outcomes of the Arab uprisings have necessarily differed from one country to another. What remains certain is that the region as a whole changed profoundly.

UNDERSTANDING THE UPRISINGS' DYNAMICS

Western observers tended to make sense of the momentous events of 2011 by drawing compelling analogies with European history. The widely used term Arab Spring likens the Arab uprisings of 2011 to earlier European instances of upheaval and dissent: for example, the 1968 Prague Spring, during which alienated youths and others sacrificed their lives to protest Soviet occupation, and the 1989 transformations that brought about an end to communist rule in central and Eastern Europe. These analogies usefully brushed aside simplistic notions of an Arab world inherently resistant to the spread of Western democratic ideals, but they failed to fully capture the nature of the transformations taking place. Some Arab voices indeed called for political liberalization along Western lines, but the pressing and widespread concerns were for dignity, social justice, and a fairer distribution of national resources.

A great deal of Western media attention initially focused on the role played by social media, like Facebook and Twitter. The interconnectedness of the public protests was indeed remarkable, and the Internet played an important role in mobilizing the opposition. Not only did such information technologies empower societies with new ways of opposing their leaders; they also undermined government's traditional monopoly on information and sapped its ability to control and manipulate the media. However, excessive focus on the Internet and social media's role suggests that the uprisings emerged from a vacuum; it fails to recognize the crucial ongoing importance of long-standing organizational frameworks. In each country, the 2011 demonstrations relied heavily on networks built up over years under severe constraints: Trade union movements in particular had organized repeated strikes in various countries in the years prior to the uprisings. The discipline demonstrated by the millions of protesters who peacefully occupied the capital cities' main squares revealed bonds of support, trust, and solidarity much more resilient than could suddenly emerge in a virtual environment.

The term Arab Awakening is also useful in that it locates the significance of the uprisings as much in the mind as in the streets; it reflects the dissipation of the fear of the state that these regimes had long cultivated. This term also identifies the uprisings' regional interconnectedness: The cultural identification that comes from speaking the same language and sharing a sense of history clearly played an important role in pushing the revolutionary momentum eastward from Tunisia; indeed, protesters across the Arab world copied specific techniques used in the Tunisian revolt, such as organizing "days of rage" and the peaceful chanting of the slogan "The people want the fall of the regime."

The immediate challenge of naming the events of 2011 has in large part reflected our proximity to complex developments that will take several years, maybe decades, to unfold. The full impact of the uprisings will not be understood for some time. Still, it is clear that a fundamental challenge has been posed to the existing political order. Indeed, the Arabic term the demonstrators themselves commonly employed is thawra (revolution). As Rami Khoury explains, that came closest to epitomizing the "activism, will, empowerment, determination and agency" of the brave crowds that risked everything to topple well-entrenched autocratic regimes.¹

The backdrop for all of the protests was the authoritarian regimes' glaring failure to meet the expectations of bulging youth populations. Ben Ali had ruled his country for twenty-three years, President Husni Mubarak had ruled Egypt for thirty years, Colonel Muammar Qaddafi had ruled Libya for forty-two years, and President Ali Abdullah Saleh had ruled Yemen for thirty-three years. All of these regimes had come to power on the promise of meeting the socioeconomic demands of the population, but over decades, their rule had become at best neglectful, at worst predatory. In their most recent attempts to manage economic development, Arab rulers had routinely undertaken reforms aimed at liberalizing their state-run economies. This involved reducing government expenditure on social programs, such as education, health care, and housing, while selling off state assets to the rich, most of whom were friends of the regime. On paper, many countries experienced higher growth rates than before. In practice, however, market reforms resulted in crony capitalism and the concentration of decision-making power in fewer and fewer hands. Record-high food prices compounded the consequences of market reforms for the majority of the population, while the strengthening of security controls deepened the overall sense of alienation. Perhaps the greatest disillusionment came from aging Arab leaders' efforts to arrange for their children to succeed them, thus perpetuating their families' rule over what they seemed to consider personal fiefdoms. Husni Mubarak's grooming of his own son Gamal, for example, pointed to a closed political system that trusted only dynastic arrangements in a state that had once staked its claim as the leading reformist Arab republic. The idea of establishing governments that were half republic (gumhuriyya) and half monarchy (malakiyya) had become so widespread that it warranted the satirical minting of a new Arabic term, gumhuriyya (coined by Saad Eddine Ibrahim).² As the ruling regimes grew older, narrower, and more avaricious and brittle, their populations became younger, poorer, more dynamic—and more aware. Across the Arab world, the median age was significantly lower than the reigns of their authoritarian rulers. That is to say that the young populations knew only one ruling regime and suffered under its prolonged failure to meet their material demands for good education, decent incomes, and sufficient housing. Increasing numbers of scholars employed the term waithood to capture the frustration and disillusionment felt by educated youth who, lacking the contacts (wasta) necessary to find meaningful employment, are thereby denied the next steps toward independence and marriage.³

Nepotism and impoverishment were shared concerns that resonated widely across the Arab world prior to 2011. But the navigation of successful political and economic transitions in individual countries required both a complex balancing of various revolutionary interests as well as the removal of entrenched countervailing forces. Three of the most significant variables have been the structure and composition of the army, the messy process of writing new constitutions, and outside powers' decisions to intervene on behalf of friends and against enemies.

EGYPT

Following the dramatic events in Tunisia in January 2011, journalists from around the world poured into Egypt to monitor the reverberations there. As the most populous Arab country, Egypt is a trendsetter. When President Mubarak was ousted on February 11, 2011, just weeks after Ben Ali fled Tunisia, observers began to describe the uprisings as a wave of protest sweeping the Arab world.

On January 25, youthful Egyptian protesters descended on Cairo's central square, Midan Tahrir, whose name commemorates Nasser's liberation of Egypt. As the major public space in Cairo, Tahrir Square had become, under Nasser's successors, a highly controlled site. But for the next eighteen days, a million people flocked there, making the square a liberated space for the expression of music, poetry, and art. This mobilization did not suddenly emerge from a vacuum; Scholarly accounts of Egypt in the 1990s and 2000s frequently use such words as stalemate, stagnation, corruption, and authoritarianism to describe President Husni Mubarak's regime. These characterizations reflect the fact that the Egyptian population's dissatisfaction with its ruling elite, already present in the late 1980s (see Chapter 19), intensified over the following decades and that popular organizations began to do what they could to reconstitute society in ways that the government was unwilling or unable to undertake.

The regime's continued determination to limit the population's opportunities for political participation compounded popular resentment over Egypt's bleak economic outlook under Mubarak. In the 1990s, Mubarak had cast aside the liberalizing tendencies of his early presidency in favor of one-party/one-leader rule. Election laws were restructured to ensure that no popularly supported opposition parties could win seats in the People's Assembly. Thus, in the 1995 parliamentary elections, fraud, vote rigging, and restricted campaign opportunities for opposition parties resulted in Mubarak's National Democratic Party's winning 94 percent of the seats, far more than the 68 percent it had won in the more open 1987 elections. The 2005 presidential election returned Mubarak for a fifth six-year term. He won with almost 89 percent of the votes, but the more important statistic was the mere 23 percent turnout. Observing the 2010 parliamentary elections, human rights groups described the poll as the most fraudulent yet. The deepening cynicism about the electoral process contributed to a rising mood of public opposition, fueled also by anger at the American invasion of Iraq and Israel's continued occupation of Palestinian territory.

Egypt experienced a long series of strikes in the years leading up to 2011. Most of these were organized by workers, especially in the textile industry, but the youth more generally also began to express their grievances. In 2004, an opposition movement called Kefaya ("Enough" in Arabic) organized a series of high-profile protests. Its members had had enough of Mubarak's presidency, were angered by the idea that his son might be set up to succeed him, and demanded an end to the country's emergency laws, in place since 1967. Tough economic conditions in 2006 and 2007 then led to a wave of workers' protests, and in 2008, textile workers in the Nile delta town of al-Mahalla al-Kubra called for a large strike on April 6. Youth activists from Kefaya and other groups formed a loose coalition called the April 6th Movement, which aimed to support the textile strike with the new tools of social media: Its first Facebook page attracted 70,000 members. By expanding their online presence into the blogosphere, activists found novel ways to defy government censorship and to raise sensitive issues as well as to subject the once-untouchable Mubarak to mockery and scorn. By 2010, Egyptian online activists were playing a key complementary role in organizing opposition to the regime. In June, they responded to the security forces' brutal killing of a young man, who had been dragged from an Internet café in Alexandria, by creating a Facebook page titled “We are all Khaled Said.” As the website, with pictures of his beaten corpse, went viral, it focused increasingly on exposing police abuse.

Opposition movements planned a protest for January 25, 2011, National Police Day, a relatively new holiday established to commemorate the 1952 British attack on an Egyptian police station. This attack had set in motion the 1952 revolution and the establishment of Nasser’s military regime, to which Mubarak was a successor. Hundreds of thousands now converged, from all parts of Cairo, onto Tahrir Square to protest police brutality and to demand that emergency law be lifted. Within hours, the crowds were chanting “The people want the fall of the regime” right in front of the Mugamma, the forbidding administrative building that symbolized Egypt’s controlling bureaucratic state. Mubarak’s security forces and riot police tried to prevent the mass gathering but withdrew after several violent confrontations. The Egyptian army was deployed to contain the protesters, but it did not fire upon them. Unlike the hated police, the conscript army had some legitimacy as a force for national unity. To be sure, the military leadership had its own interests to protect; it may have been worried that the soldiers would refuse orders to fire, perhaps it heeded behind-the-scenes concerns expressed by the United States, or maybe it had its own interest in ridding the regime of the president’s son Gamal. On February 11, with antiregime demonstrations spreading throughout the country and the threat of massive labor strikes looming, the army became convinced of the need to assume control. Mubarak was placed under house arrest in his vacation retreat at Sharm al-Shaykh. When, in August, an ailing Mubarak was wheeled on a gurney into a cage in a courtroom, Egyptians found the sight at once shocking and cathartic.

Formal executive power was now in the hands of the Supreme Council of Armed Forces (SCAF), a body of top military and political officers. Although it promised a quick transition to democracy, the process of transferring power to civilians over the following year was full of torturous twists and turns that suggested the SCAF was intent on retaining real power. Of obvious concern to the military leadership was the protection of its well-entrenched political and economic privileges—what had become known as the deep state. The term drew comparisons to the shadowy matrix of Turkey’s intertwined political and military elites, who, for decades before Erdogan, had held the brake on democratic reforms. The SCAF’s determined effort to ensure that the deep state remain intact resulted in growing polarization between the army and the Muslim Brotherhood, the two groups that, in the short term, could draw upon the country’s best-organized political machines. Such a stark choice between a military security state and a conservative religious state was clearly not what the January 25 revolutionaries had marched for. But when new parliamentary elections were held at the end of 2011, followed by the naming of a constitutional assembly and the presidential election in 2012, it was the Muslim Brotherhood that was best positioned in the short term to mobilize public support in the new political landscape.

The Islamists' Moment?

The growing influence of Islamist parties in the wake of the Arab uprisings surprised some observers. Yet in light of the history discussed in this book, it is difficult to argue that it could be otherwise. Since the 1970s, Islamist politics had become one of the most enduring Middle Eastern phenomena. Islamists often posed the most credible opposition to failing Arab regimes—either as militant radical minorities or, increasingly, as moderate centrists who worked within the system to rebuild and reform society. Egypt, which simultaneously experienced moderate and violent Islamist movements, offers a revealing case study to review both the negative stereotypes disseminated in the West as well as the troubled interaction between failed authoritarian regimes and their Islamist opposition seen throughout the region.

For years, the United States sought to avoid finding a place for Islamist parties in their promotion of democracy in the region. One of the major platforms of US foreign policy has been combating terrorism: This became the single-most pressing imperative for President George W. Bush in the aftermath of the 9/11 terrorist attacks. Because of terrorist acts committed by a few Islamist organizations in the past, the United States tended to equate the acts of a small minority as representative of the attitudes of Islamist activists throughout the world. Not only did American policy lump together a diverse collection of actors whose interests often clashed sharply—for example, al-Qa‘ida, Saddam Husayn, and the Iranian government—it marginalized religious parties that had followed a strategy of political participation. It also ignored the vast majority of Islamists who were working peacefully for domestic reforms within their respective countries. By constructing a political framework that judged all Islamic movements in the narrow context of its own security interests and antiterrorist measures, the United States distanced itself from genuinely popular movements within the Middle East and elsewhere, creating barriers to working with the forces that might shape the future of Islam globally.

This negative attitude was compounded by the American popular press, which continued to disseminate stereotypes of Muslims, and by political and academic circles promoting the idea that the containment of Islam should replace the containment of the Soviet Union as an organizing theme of US policy. There could be little doubt that the United States was uncomfortable with political Islam. In part this was because few US officials acknowledged that the intrusive US presence in the Middle East and US support for oppressive and unpopular regimes were primary causes that nurtured many Islamist movements. As political Islam, of the anti-Western and, specifically, anti-American type, became one of the driving forces of opposition movements in the Arab Middle East, the United States became trapped in a contradiction between its expressed goals and its actual policies. Although claiming to favor the establishment of democracy and political pluralism throughout the region, the United States was reduced to shoring up geriatric and repressive rulers who accepted US hegemony in the Middle East.

As authoritarian governments such as Egypt's moved to silence political opposition in the 1970s and 1980s, religious associations increasingly became the method through which popular dissent was expressed. The popular Egyptian response to economic stagnation, political repression, and regime corruption gave rise to two distinct approaches to Islamist activism, which emerged simultaneously. In the first, Islamist militants launched armed insurrections against the regime with the intent of overthrowing it, as in the 1981 assassination of Anwar Sadat. In 1992, intermittent clashes between young Islamist radicals and government security forces erupted into a coordinated insurgency against the regime. In addition to assassinating officials, the radicals sought to bring down the regime by disrupting the tourist industry and thus creating further economic difficulties. The most devastating incident occurred in fall 1997, when Islamist extremists massacred more than sixty foreign tourists near the city of Luxor. The Mubarak government responded with a brutal counterinsurgency campaign. Security forces made massive arrests of extremists, sympathizers, and, often, their friends and relatives in a campaign of intimidation and government violence that made no pretense of observing human rights or the rule of law. By the late 1990s, the government's draconian measures had enabled the security forces to quell the radicals' activities. A small minority, stirred to greater efforts by their failure so far to topple the government and enraged more than shattered by imprisonment and forced confessions, followed Ayman al-Zawahiri, who became number two in al-Qa'ida's political hierarchy (see Chapter 25).

Amid such disintegrating attempts of extremists to overthrow the Egyptian government by force, another form of Islamic activism that had profound implications was gaining momentum. It was carried out by volunteer organizations working to institutionalize Islamic revivalism within mainstream Egyptian society, a process that has been called a "quiet revolution." This form of activism represented the desire of the population at large to participate in the political process and to build a new society based on democracy, respect for human rights, and, especially, social justice—an objective that was a prominent feature of the Quranic revelations. For all its spontaneity and diversity, this moderate activism owed much of its success to the organizational capacity of that most resilient of modern Egyptian organizations, the Muslim Brotherhood.

Motivated more by a social than a strictly religious agenda, the moderate activists of the Brotherhood sought to integrate general Islamic principles with responsible social reform. By the 1990s, the Brotherhood and several other middle-class volunteer organizations had established a network of charitable institutions: health clinics, hospitals, food distribution centers, welfare assistance, day care centers, legal aid societies, emergency relief agencies, and innovative transport programs. The very presence of these programs testified to the existing system's failings and accounted for much of the Muslim Brotherhood's popularity and its legitimacy as an alternative governing party, allowing it to become deeply institutionalized within mainstream society. For example, members of the Muslim Brotherhood and other Islamic moderates dominated the professional syndicates of lawyers, doctors, engineers, and journalists. Further evidence of the extent of the quiet revolution was found in the proliferation of private mosques and Islamic schools outside the government's direct supervision. Most scholars of the moderate Islamist movement argue that it embraced individuals from all social classes and age groups and was inclusive of women. Its growing numbers were a testament to the popularity of its social outreach and programs, the steadfastness of its opposition to a regime that had increasingly isolated itself from a large segment of its citizens, and its ability to speak to many Egyptians' powerful desire for the realization of Islamic ideals and norms.

The Brotherhood's well-honed regional networks in cities and the countryside clearly gave it a tremendous organizational advantage in the new political environment created by the 2011 uprisings. In the immediate aftermath of Mubarak's departure in February, it launched a new political party, called the Freedom and Justice Party (FJP), under the leadership of a sixty-year-old engineering professor, Muhammad Morsi. Though Morsi appeared an uncompromising candidate with little charisma, the FJP was an electoral powerhouse in contrast to its inexperienced secular and liberal opponents, who lacked the same connections with the general public. The FJP won an overwhelming two-thirds majority in the 2011 parliamentary elections, but Morsi won only a slim majority in the 2012 presidential election. With many Egyptians voting more against the former regime than for Morsi, expectations among the deeply divided country ran high.

To be sure, the Muslim Brotherhood faced huge challenges. Morsi inherited a wasteful and corrupt bureaucracy, failing government services, massive unemployment, rising government debt, and crippling fuel shortages. But perhaps even more important than a competent government, Egyptians demanded an inclusive government, one that protected political pluralism and directed its energies toward building the independent institutions of the country. Instead, Morsi's exclusive rule quickly began to resemble the previous regime, though with his own focus on reshaping Egyptian culture. Moreover, not only did the Muslim Brotherhood lack the expertise and competency to transform into a governing organization with national policies and platforms; the historic attributes that had helped the Muslim Brotherhood survive for decades as a repressed movement became its main weaknesses as a credible national political force. Though highly experienced in grassroots mobilization, the Muslim Brotherhood remained isolated and deeply distrustful of powerful elements in Egyptian society that it saw as trying to sabotage it. Paranoid about past oppression, the Muslim Brotherhood worried more about monopolizing power and marginalizing others than about building alliances or protecting the independence of national institutions such as the judiciary or the media.

Two major turning points mark the precipitous decline of popular support for Morsi's government. The first came in November 2012, when Morsi issued a presidential decree that granted him sweeping new powers beyond the reach of the judicial system. In line with what was widely feared to be a power grab to entrench the Muslim Brotherhood's rule of Egypt, Morsi also pushed the appointment of loyal Brotherhood members into key political and cultural posts. For example, he appointed as governor of Luxor a former member of the radical group that murdered tourists there sixteen years earlier. Second, the Morsi government imposed a new religiously tinged constitution, which was crafted with no input from the opposition and pushed through with little time for debate. These actions caused immense concern among Egyptians who had risked everything to oppose Mubarak's regime; they worried that if the Muslim Brotherhood was not stopped soon, Egypt would lose its opportunity to build a democratic future. In June 2013, the first anniversary of Morsi's accession to power, people again took to the streets in protest. When demonstrations turned violent, the commander of the Supreme Council of the Armed Forces, General Abdul Fattah al-Sisi, sent in the army. Muhammad Morsi, Egypt's first elected president, had survived only one year in office.

The Counterrevolutionary Forces

At first, al-Sisi was widely hailed in Egypt as a national savior, and almost all of the country's media celebrated the army's operations. But to many others, a coup is a coup—even if the United States hesitated to call it one—and they worried that a dangerous precedent was being set by not allowing the FJP to sit out their term until the next elections, which they most likely would have lost. Instead, the army acted as if they had been given a free hand in dealing with the Muslim Brotherhood, which they officially designated a terrorist organization after militants began initiating armed resistance. In the brutal crackdown that followed, over a thousand pro-Morsi protesters were killed, tens of thousands of Brotherhood members, including Morsi and the top leadership, were imprisoned, and hundreds were sentenced to death without due process. Hundreds of cases of torture and forced disappearance also marked al-Sisi's rebuilding of a military police state that stifled all dissenting voices, including those of secular activists. Helped along by billions of dollars of Gulf oil money, al-Sisi ensconced the military's privileges and ensured the interests of the crony capitalists.

Militant attacks against government officials were commonplace in the aftermath of President Morsi's toppling, and the spiraling violence both undermined and reinforced al-Sisi's efforts at projecting stability. The Muslim Brotherhood leadership denied any involvement in the violence, but younger members challenged its long-standing rejection of violence in response to the government's brutal crackdown. Security forces became engaged in an especially fierce battle with Islamist militants in the least secure but strategically sensitive Sinai Peninsula, where hundreds of police and soldiers were killed. The Sinai insurgency's origins mostly stemmed from the grievances of the marginalized and impoverished local Bedouin tribes. But the army's heavy-handed counter-insurgency operations, criticized by many analysts as collective punishment, were potentially driving a new generation of opponents into the hands of jihadi extremists. In 2014, the Sinai militants pledged allegiance to ISIS and adopted the name Sinai Province to signal they were now a part of the state ISIS sought to establish from the territory it controlled in Syria and Iraq (see Chapter 25).

Al-Sisi shed his uniform to campaign for the presidential election held in May 2014. Amidst a very low turnout, he won over 96 percent of the vote, which reflected both Egyptians' exhaustion with economic and political uncertainties and a general willingness to see the army as a bulwark against the extremist turmoil into which neighboring states of Libya, Syria, and Iraq had sunk. This was a premise that the United States was also prepared to accept when it then turned a blind eye to President al-Sisi's human rights abuses and resumed the military sales and exercises that it had suspended right after the military coup. The return to one-man rule at the end of 2015 marked an unmistakable victory for the counterrevolutionary forces in Egypt. Following five years of turmoil, the short-term appeal of—or at least apathy toward—accepting President al-Sisi as the sole guardian of stability clearly gained some traction. However, the extreme measures al-Sisi has taken to stifle any protest betrays his own lack of confidence in his ability to restore the pre-2011 conditions that the uprisings had ruptured so spectacularly, and if al-Sisi’s draconian crackdowns on civil society lead Egyptians to repudiate the army as they did the Muslim Brotherhood, Egypt will find itself closer to finally achieving its revolutionary goals.

As volatile as the political transition in Egypt was, it has appeared relatively smooth in comparison with the much bloodier uprisings in Syria, Yemen, and Libya. The collapse of these countries into violent civil wars and bitter stalemates has drawn attention to the significant differences among the Arab authoritarian regimes and raised fundamental questions about the legitimacy and value of international interventions.

SYRIA

To many observers of the 2011 uprisings, Syria initially appeared immune to the waves of protest engulfing other parts of the Arab world. For one thing, Bashar al-Assad, at age forty-five, was much younger than neighboring autocrats and had, in fact, engaged in a brief period of reforms—sometimes referred to as a Damascus Spring—after he succeeded his father in 2000. Moreover, he enjoyed a degree of popularity among the Syrian population as a result of his “resistance” to the foreign policies of the United States and Israel. The regime also sought to derive stability from the ethnically and religiously divided population’s fear of bloody sectarian fragmentation, such as had recently been witnessed in neighboring Iraq and Lebanon. Such anxieties could be manipulated by the regime, whose own brutal track record of repressing any sign of dissent was also well known.

None of this, however, deterred Syrian protesters from emulating the peaceful demands elsewhere for regime change. The Syrian population had experienced the same frustrations and expressed the same resentments due to widespread poverty, human rights violations, and the lack of representation that came with inherited presidencies. As in Egypt, a decade of liberalizing reforms had resulted in the deterioration of social welfare programs while former government assets found their way into the hands of a small elite with close links to the ruler. Unlike Egypt, the Syrian leadership’s ability to tighten its grip on power is best understood in terms of its overall social cohesion. The al-Assad family filled key positions in the state apparatus with its relatives and other members of the Alawite community, thus giving them a fundamental stake in preserving the regime (see Chapter 21). The army's leadership and the multiple security organizations were more tightly interwoven with the ruling circle in Syria than in Egypt or Tunisia.

The rural town of Deraa was the focal point for the emergence of the Syrian uprisings. In early March, some children were arrested for writing antiregime graffiti on a wall. When families took to the streets to protest their children's harsh treatment, they were fired upon. The bloody crackdown was intended to intimidate any opposition from gathering momentum, but it only ignited the population's rage and triggered the by-now-familiar cycle of repression and resistance. Bashar al-Assad's resort to force could not subdue the demonstrators; indeed, the ongoing repression became a sign of desperation from an increasingly isolated regime that saw no alternative to imposing its rule in ever more brutal forms that quickly turned peaceful demonstrations into armed reprisals.

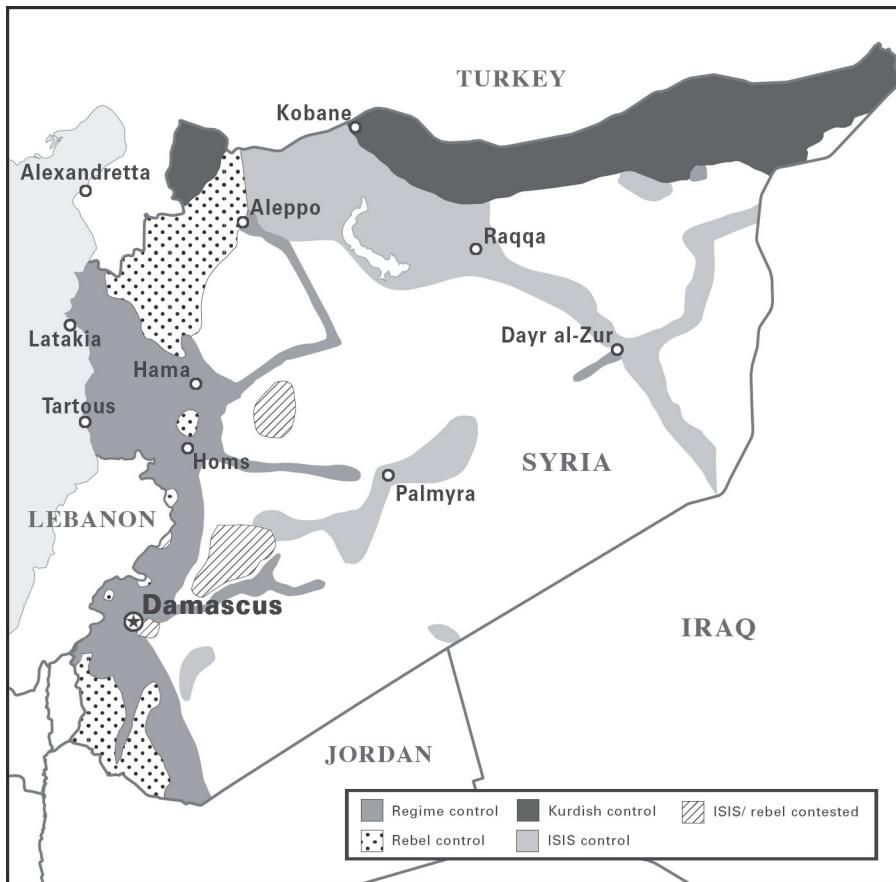

The violence deteriorated into a grisly civil war, one that attracted increasing numbers of foreign interests as zealously as it drove out growing numbers of desperate Syrian refugees. The fighting developed into a complex and multifaceted stalemate that no side could win. On the one hand, although the al-Assad regime lost control of three-quarters of the country, including the oil fields in the north and east, it consolidated its tight grip over most urban populations in the west. The balance of power frequently shifted over the first five years of fighting, but the regime succeeded in securing control over a swath of territory stretching from Damascus through the strategic town of Homs to the coastal region of Latakia, where the Alawite population is concentrated. Strategically, the al-Assad regime benefited much more than the rebel groups from its overall coherence and from the much more generous support it received from its allies, especially Russia, Iran, and Hizbullah. Whereas Iran has seen Syria as a stalwart ally since the 1979 revolution and supplies Hizbullah through Syria, Russia has also sought to leverage support for al-Assad, its one remaining client in the region, to reestablish its waning influence.

On the other hand, the country dissolved into a patchwork of feuding warlords, much to the regime's advantage. In essence, a second front developed between the moderate rebel groups and the new jihadi groups that took advantage of the chaos in large parts of the north and west (see Map 26.1), while a third front emerged along the Turkish frontier where Kurdish forces attempted to carve out their own territory. The moderate Syrian rebel groups have been the least successful in acquiring sophisticated weapons and in developing a coherent command and control structure. Western governments have long been wary of getting sucked into the chaos and seeing their arms supplies falling into the hands of more extreme groups. Partly as a result, it was the jihadi forces that achieved the greater military success on the battlefield. Many rebel fighters accordingly switched allegiance, attracted either by the military prowess or the better pay. The most extreme of the jihadi groups and the one that has drawn in the most foreign fighters is ISIS (the Islamic State of Iraq and al-Sham; see Chapter 25). ISIS was born of Iraq's political disintegration following the 2003 US invasion but received a huge boost from al-Assad's efforts to radicalize the opposition. His decision to empty the jails early in the conflict while tacitly cooperating with the jihadists in their fight against other rebels can be seen as part of a larger, self-fulfilling strategy of convincing Syrians, especially its minorities, as well as the outside world that he is protecting them from ruthless terrorists.

This war of attrition has had horrendous consequences. In the first five years, up to 300,000 people were killed. Twelve million Syrians—half of the overall Syrian population—were displaced, often more than once. Of those displaced, 5 million sought refuge in Turkey, Lebanon, and Jordan. Unable to work legally and with international aid declining, an entire generation is growing up without proper education. In 2015, over a million Syrians, having completely given up hope for their future in the region, risked the treacherous journey by boat to Europe. There are increasing calls for outside intervention as the tragedies continue to mount, but the bitter polarization between the disparate groups, and between their international sponsors who continue to fuel the fighting with military aid, continually stymie international diplomatic efforts. Major challenges include how to bring the divided opposition groups together under one umbrella and how to identify who might be able to represent them collectively in negotiations. Another big question is: What, if any, should Bashar al-Assad's future role be? Syrian rebel groups insist that al-Assad bears too much responsibility for the destruction and turmoil to be able to stay in power, even in a transitional power-sharing formula. Russia and Iran, however, remain committed to propping up his regime. Western governments had initially refused to participate in a negotiated transition and insisted on al-Assad's removal, but their increasing concern with the threat of ISIS and with the pressure to stem the flow of refugees to Europe are making them more willing to tolerate al-Assad, despite the fact that his continued rule risks pushing more Syrian rebels into the hands of the jihadists.

MAP 26.1. Syrian Civil War, as of September 2015.

YEMEN AND LIBYA

In Yemen, regional rivalries and secessionist struggles greatly complicated the process of change: The north had been subject to a small-scale rebellion by the Houthis, a tribal people who practice a unique version of Shi'a Islam called Zaydism, while the former South Yemen was discontented over its disenfranchisement by the northern-based regime. The youth nonetheless took inspiration from Tunisia to demand the ousting of President Ali Abdullah Saleh after his more than three decades of power. Saleh's regime initially responded with a strategy that incorporated both concessions and repression, but a population deeply skeptical of its leader's word widely dismissed the promise of reforms, while the repression, as elsewhere, only brought more protesters to the streets. With the fighting between opposition groups and government loyalists intensifying, Saleh agreed to a transition plan brokered by the six-nation Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC). The plan, which called for Saleh to step down in favor of his vice president, Abdu Rabbu Mansour Hadi, seemed to open the way for greater participation by opposition groups. But by leaving the elites from Saleh's regime in dominant positions and ignoring the grievances of the Houthis and of the south, the plan failed to establish a new order.

The marginalized Houthis moved first to exploit the political vacuum of the transitional process. Having consolidated control over the northern highlands during 2011, they pushed southward in 2013 as part of an alliance with military and government forces loyal to the former president, Abdullah Saleh. Although Saleh had fought Houthi insurgencies between 2004 and 2010, during which the Houthis emerged as one of the country's most effective fighting forces, he now saw this marriage of convenience as a way to ensure the fall of his successor. The Saleh-Houthi coalition forces succeeded in ousting President Hadi in January 2015. As Hadi left for exile in Saudi Arabia, a Saudi-led coalition bombed Houthi positions, set up a naval blockade on the entire country, and then, over the summer of 2015, launched a ground invasion in the hope of reinstalling Hadi. Saudi Arabia asserted that the Houthis were part of an Iranian-led axis that was gaining influence throughout the region, but there was little evidence of much Iranian support. The first six months of the invasion caused such destruction that aid agencies admonished Saudi Arabia for breaching international law and warned of the mounting humanitarian toll, with thousands killed, hundreds of thousands displaced, and millions on the verge of famine. Not only did this destruction further exacerbate the tensions threatening the future unity of the country; the consequences extended far beyond the borders of Yemen. Indeed, the main beneficiaries of the instability and turmoil were ISIS and al-Qa'ida in the Arabian Peninsula (AQAP). In January 2015, AQAP claimed responsibility for the deadly assault on the Paris office of the French newspaper Charlie Hebdo, which killed eleven people.

In Libya, protests against Colonel Qaddafi's corrupt and capricious rule erupted shortly after Mubarak's fall in February 2011. At first, the Libyan opposition sought to emulate the peaceful rallies in Tunisia and Egypt. But Qaddafi's decision to dig in led the protests in a very different direction. Qaddafi's four-decade effort to consolidate his power base had focused on manipulating cleavages in kinship and regional identities. The national military was kept weak to prevent any coup attempts; instead, resources were directed toward elite units composed of tribal allies and led by his family members. A regional divide on the Mediterranean coast exacerbated these fractures. Most significantly, a vast stretch of desert separated the capital, Tripoli, where Qaddafi had invested the most in political and economic resources, from the neglected eastern province of Cyrenaica. When, in early March, Qaddafi issued ominous military threats against a rebel force that had taken control of the eastern city of Benghazi, the UN Security Council passed Resolution 1973 authorizing member states to protect Libyan civilians. Such support took the form of aerial attacks and on-the-ground intelligence provided by NATO forces. Alone and isolated, the regime fell in late August 2011, and Qaddafi himself was brutally killed the following month. But the country was then torn by the violent civil war that further exacerbated preexisting social and geographical rifts, and eventually two rival parliaments emerged, one in Tripoli and the other in the eastern city of Tobruk. In these circumstances, Libya's fragmented landscape, with its corrupt and fractured but lucrative oil sector, also became a tempting target for ISIS.

SAUDI ARABIA AND THE GULF MONARCHIES

For a number of reasons, most Gulf monarchies, with the notable exception of Bahrain, did not initially face the same challenges that confronted the secular dictatorships. To be sure, the younger generation in the Gulf countries expressed similar frustrations with the lack of employment opportunities and resentment toward closed political systems. Nonetheless, the Gulf monarchies hold certain advantages in confronting the calls for reform. First, ruling dynasties here tended to enjoy greater legitimacy and even loyalty from their own citizens. Not only did they draw on deeply held associations with state and society; they could also call on religious authorities to bolster their standing. Second, the flexibility of their monarchical structures have allowed them to absorb some of the impact of Arab uprisings elsewhere: By appearing to stand above politics, monarchs could deflect attention from themselves by changing parliamentary governments and calling for the removal of prime ministers or changes to current cabinets. Third, the nature of the opposition has differed significantly because the Gulf countries rely heavily on foreign laborers who are wary of how easily political mobilization can lead to deportation. Fourth, Gulf monarchs had time to reflect on what was happening: Just as Arab populations learned from neighboring uprisings, so too did their leaders. Flush with cash at the time of the uprisings thanks to years of high oil prices, Gulf monarchies consciously sought to avoid Tunisian- and Egyptian-style protests with a determined strategy that combined both co-option and coercion. Saudi Arabia, for example, quickly announced the distribution of billions of dollars to new social welfare measures aimed at addressing housing shortages and rising unemployment.

Although such stopgap measures may have initially deflected some attention from grievances with the economic and political status quo, more significant for the long term was the cautious promotion of political and social reforms. For example, in the years following the uprisings, somewhat greater space was made available to women in public life—although it is still constrained by the guardian system that requires women to seek the consent of men. In addition to joining the workforce in larger numbers, women were allowed to vote in municipal elections and stand for office in them—they just couldn't drive themselves to the polls.

Finally, the threat of force and measures to stifle expressions of dissent also matched Saudi Arabia's hesitant implementation of reforms and temporary deluge of social welfare investments. The Saudi government was quick to deploy security forces in sensitive areas, for example, in the country's eastern provinces, where there is a large Shi'a population. The forceful repression of any opposition was most brutally felt on the neighboring island state of Bahrain, where the Sunni al-Khalifa dynasty rules over a largely Shi'a population. On February 14, 2011, Bahraini activists congregated around the central Pearl roundabout in the capital Manama to demand greater representation. The Shi'a majority of Bahrain had, for the past decade, been active in their protests against the discrimination by which the ruling family denied them access to economic and political opportunities. But the al-Khalifa family and the Sunni rulers in Saudi Arabia portrayed the protests solely in sectarian terms. For the Saudi rulers, the challenge posed by the efforts of the Shi'a majority in Bahrain to force a transition to a constitutional monarchy was twofold: On the one hand, there was the alarming prospect that Bahraini demands for concession would spread to the Shi'a populations of Saudi Arabia's own eastern province, and on the other, the Saudi monarchy feared that the demonstrations represented an attempt by Iran to stir up trouble—despite a lack of evidence of any such intervention in Bahrain's opposition movement. When the al-Khalifa family launched a brutal crackdown on the protesters, it did so with Saudi and United Arab Emirate forces visibly deployed on the causeway linking the island country to the mainland. All the while, the United States, which not only maintains an important naval base in Bahrain but was also eager not to antagonize its Saudi ally, showed no interest whatsoever in supporting the prodemocracy demonstrators.

In the wake of the 2011 uprisings, the unsettling question of succession exacerbated simmering tensions over access to power and wealth in Saudi Arabia. King Abdullah was eighty-seven years old at the time of the Arab uprisings. When he died in January 2015, his seventy-nine-year-old half-brother, Salman, succeeded him. In a move that carried tremendous potential for increasing factional rivalry among the royal family, in April 2015, King Salman announced his plan to pass power to the younger generation of princes by appointing his own son Muhammad bin Salman as crown prince. Together, the new rulers took on a much more aggressive foreign policy, the outcome of which will determine just how straightforward future successions will be. In their single-minded pursuit of Saudi Arabia's own regional interests, billions of dollars were spent on launching a war against a Yemeni insurgency while still propping up al-Sisi's counterrevolutionary regime in Egypt and supporting the politically and militarily divided rebel groups fighting al-Asad in Syria.

Meanwhile, geopolitical realignments were unfolding that also greatly increased the pressure on the Saudi leadership. Just as their rash, expensive foreign adventures were draining public finances, global oil prices collapsed. (A central factor in the collapse was Saudi Arabia's own decision to maintain high levels of production as a way of protecting its share of the global market.) In addition, the general sense of US retrenchment under President Obama and the deal Obama negotiated with its arch rival Iran (see Chapter 25) clearly strained relations with the United States, their long-standing ally. As the Saudi leadership clearly feared the potential for a sanctions-free Iran to increase its influence throughout the region, many observers wondered whether enough attention and resources were being paid to deal with the domestic expectations of a growing population less interested in costly foreign policies than they were in their own future.

CONCLUSION: CONNECTING THREADS

The Arab uprisings are more than just a part of the politics of the Middle East at the beginning of the twenty-first century; they are also an integral part of the historical legacy spawned by the dismemberment of the Ottoman Empire a hundred years earlier. British and French officials drew new borders to serve European imperial interests, creating new Arab states at the end of the Ottoman order. Ever since, Arab leaders have had to cope with the consequences of those borders; indeed, responses to externally imposed conditions that were ill-suited to the needs of the region's inhabitants have generally shaped the patterns of post-Ottoman history in the Arab Middle East.

In seeking, upon independence, to reshape their societies in a manner more appropriate to popular needs, the first wave of reformers, represented by Nasser and his imitators, introduced planned economies, new social welfare systems, land reform policies, and expanded educational opportunities. But the planned economy turned out to be inefficient, and the next generation of Arab rulers adopted and manipulated limited free-market economies. Moreover, the educational systems quickly became overcrowded, and university graduates' employment expectations went unfulfilled while the welfare systems proved too costly for some states but were politically impossible to cancel. And then, in 1991, all states of the region were forced to deal with the post-Soviet reality of hegemonic US power there, even as the same aging leaderships continued to hold sway. The political promise of independence had vanished with the consolidation of authoritarian single-party regimes dominated by one-man rule. This trend that began in the 1950s continued until 2011.

The 2011 Arab uprisings were a time of great enthusiasm in which the populations of all Arab countries could imagine a new socioeconomic and political order. After decades of being subjected to ossified political structures and corrupted economic reforms, Arab populations felt empowered. To be sure, each country faced particular challenges in seeking a more equitable and democratic society. But citizens' willingness to risk their lives in peaceful waves of protest to demand a better future—one framed in terms of universal concerns such as social justice, human dignity, and the rule of law—has already proved revolutionary. But the events of 2011 are still only a beginning, and they will take years to work themselves out—revolutions do not happen in a season, however spring-like it might feel. Counterrevolutionary forces with their own vested interests always work hard to pretend that nothing has in fact changed.

In the face of such volatility, there has been increasing debate about redrawing the map of the Middle East and erasing the European-drawn borders. Indeed, ISIS proclaimed the “End of Sykes-Picot” when it spread from Syria to Iraq in 2014. Yet where exactly do the profound challenges to the status quo lie? In the delineation and imposition of colonial borders, or in how Arab leaders have since coped with their consequences? Over the last century, European-drawn borders in the Middle East have not only been relatively stable but have also framed, over the course of several generations, the development of territorial nationalisms that cannot be easily dismissed. The most significant challenge has been to build inclusive societies within those borders and in meeting the socioeconomic demands of the populations growing rapidly within them. The Arab uprisings dramatically exposed aging authoritarian leaders’ failures to maintain or rebuild the social pacts that emerged in the early postcolonial period, and the rupturing of these failed authoritarian models of government has been widely celebrated. The trouble is that, as Yezid Sayigh observes, “They have not been replaced by clear alternatives.”⁴ The really challenging task that lies ahead seems to be one of reaching new power-sharing equilibriums within Arab states rather than speculating over where new borders should be drawn.

GLOSSARY

- Aliyah. Literally “the act of going up,” as in ascending to Jerusalem; the term designates Jewish immigration to Palestine or Israel.
- Amir. Military commander, governor, minor ruler; in Syria and Lebanon, a hereditary title carried within certain distinguished Arab families.
- Ashkenazim. Jews whose recent ancestors were of East European origin and generally spoke Yiddish.
- Askeri. Literally “the military”; used to distinguish the Ottoman ruling elite from the ordinary tax-paying subjects of the empire.
- A‘yan. Notable persons; term for prominent urban Arab and Turkish notables.
- Ayatollah. Title given to the most eminent Shi‘a legal experts.
- Bazaaris. As used in this book, a term referring to the urban bazaar merchants of Iran; ranging from large-scale import-export businessmen to merchants with a local client base, the bazaaris formed a conservative class that was often politically and socially allied with the ulama.
- Bey. Title for senior officials in the Ottoman service beneath the rank of pasha; carried over in post-Ottoman society as a term of respect.
- Caliph. The successor to the Prophet as the head of the universal Islamic community; the institution was known as the caliphate.
- Capitulations. Commercial treaties between the Ottoman Empire and the states of Western Europe granting Europeans favorable tariffs and extraterritorial privileges.
- Derebey. Rural Anatolian notable.
- Devshirme. The Ottoman levy of Christian youths of Balkan origin to be trained for service in the administration or the military.

Dhimmi. A protected non-Muslim living under Muslim rule.

Divan. The Ottoman council of state presided over by the grand vizier (q.v.).

Feddan. A unit of land measurement equal to 1.04 acres (.416 ha).

Fellah (pl. fellahin). Peasant; farmer.

Gazi. A Muslim frontier warrior fighting against non-Muslims to extend the territories of Islam; gazis played a significant role in the rise of the Ottoman Empire.

Ghulam. Male slaves in the service of the state; the slave soldiers of the Safavid Empire.

Grand vizier. The highest-ranking administrative official in the Ottoman Empire.

Gumlukiyya. The merger of two Arabic words for “republic” (gumhuriya) and “monarchy” (malakiya) to describe the aging hereditary dictatorships in the Middle East.

Hadith. A verified account of a statement or action of the Prophet Muhammad; the corpus of hadith is one of the main sources of Islamic law.

Hajj. The ritual obligation of pilgrimage to Mecca; it is one of the five pillars of Islam.

Hijrah. The emigration of Muhammad and his followers from Mecca to Medina in 622; the event marks the year 1 on the Muslim calendar.

Hudna. Often translated in English as “truce”; distinct from a shorter-term calming or quieting of events known as a tahdiya (q.v.).

Ijma. Consensus of legal scholars or of the Muslim community as a whole on a matter of religious law.

Ijtihad. The exercise of informed human reason in deciding matters of Islamic law.

Imam. The leader of the Islamic public prayers; the title of some Muslim rulers. In Shi‘ism, the divinely guided head of the community who is regarded as infallible by virtue of his direct descent from the Prophet Muhammad.

Infitah. Literally “opening”; term used to designate the policy of economic liberalization introduced into Egypt in the 1970s.

Intifada. From a word meaning to be “shaken off”; name given to the Palestinian protest movement that began in 1987 against Israeli occupation of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. A second intifada, which also came to be known as the al Aqsa Intifada, began in September 2000.

Isma‘ilis (or “Seveners”). A branch of the Shi‘a who consider the line of Imams to be unbroken from Ali to the present; the Agha Khan is currently the divinely guided head of this community.

Jahiliyyah. “The days of ignorance,” referring to the times before Muhammad received God’s revelations. Some contemporary Muslim activists accuse their leaders of being in a state of jahiliyyah—that is, of neglecting to rule according to Islamic principles.

Janissary. The Ottoman infantry corps recruited mainly through the devshirme (q.v.).

Jihad. The exertion of effort in the cause of Islam; an inner struggle against impious temptations; religiously sanctioned warfare by Muslims against non-Muslims.

Jizyah. Poll tax paid by non-Muslim subjects of the Islamic state.

Ka‘ba. The most sacred Islamic shrine; located in Mecca, it is the object of the hajj (q.v.).

Kefaya. Literally “enough”; name of the Egyptian political movement protesting continued rule by President Mubarak.

Madrasah. A college whose primary purpose is the teaching of Islamic law and related religious subjects.

Mahdi. A divinely guided figure who is expected to appear in the last days and establish the rule of Islam on earth; Muhammad Ahmad of the Sudan assumed the title during his rebellion against the Egyptians.

Majlis. Council; parliament.

Marja al-taqlid. The source of emulation; in Shi‘ism, the term designates a learned scholar of Islamic law whose legal opinions are binding on all Muslims who have accepted him as their spiritual guide.

Millet. A recognized religious community in the Ottoman Empire; the Ottomans administered their non-Muslim subjects through the millets and allowed them a large measure of internal autonomy in religious and legal affairs.

Mufti. An expert in Islamic law qualified to give authoritative legal opinions known as fatwas (q.v.); muftis were members of the ulama establishment and ranked above qadis (q.v.).

Mujtahid. One who is recognized as competent to exercise ijtihad (q.v.).

Pasha. The highest Ottoman official title; it was granted both to civilian administrators and to military commanders. Like the term bey (q.v.), it survived the Ottoman era and came to be used as a term of respect in Turkish and Arab society.

Qadi. A judge in a court administering religious law.

Qiyas. Analogical reasoning or deduction based on the Quran or hadith (q.v.); one of the sources for the shari‘ah.

Qizilbash. Shi‘a tribal warriors, mainly of Turkish origin, whose military triumphs played a crucial part in the rise of the Safavid Empire. The name means the redheaded ones and derives from the colorful headgear worn by the tribesmen.

Quran. The holy scripture of Islam; the book containing the revelations of God to Muhammad.

Rashidun. “The rightly guided ones”; a title given to the first four caliphs.

Salafiyyah. From an Arabic word meaning ancestor, with special reference to the pious Muslims who lived at the time of the Prophet and the Rashidun (q.v.). Salafiyyah is the early twentieth-century Islamic reform movement that called for a return to the principles followed by the venerable ancestors.

Salat. Obligatory Muslim ritual prayer; one of the five pillars of Islam.

Sawm. Fasting; the obligatory duty for all Muslims to fast from dawn to dusk during the month of Ramadan; one of the five pillars of Islam.

Sephardim. Jews whose ancestors came from Spain and spoke Ladino among themselves; later also loosely applied to “Oriental” Jews from the Middle East and North Africa to distinguish them from Jews of East European background.

Shahadah. The obligatory Muslim profession of faith asserting belief in one God and in God’s designation of Muhammad as his Prophet; one of the five pillars of Islam.

Shahanshah. Meaning king of kings, the term denotes the ancient Iranian concept of an all-powerful monarch.

Shari‘ah. Literally “path” or “way”; the divinely ordained law of Islam that governs all aspects of Muslim behavior.

Sharif. Term given to individuals claiming direct descent from Muhammad.

Shaykh. A tribal leader; head of a village or religious order; term of respect for an elder.

Shaykh al-Islam. The head of the Islamic religious establishment in the Ottoman Empire.

Shi‘a. The group of Muslims who regard Ali and his descendants as the only legitimate successors to the Prophet. In the Shi‘a view, Ali and his line are divinely guided Imams.

Shi‘ism. The version of Islam practiced by the Shi‘a; of the many branches of Shi‘ism, the two major groups are Seveners, or Isma‘ilis (q.v.), and Twelvers.

Sipahi. Ottoman feudal cavalryman; holder of a timar (q.v.).

Sufism. Islamic mysticism.

Sultan. From a word meaning power, authority. Beginning in the tenth century, the term was used to designate the temporal sovereign as distinct from the caliph (q.v.). From the early sixteenth century to 1922, the Ottoman rulers united the two offices, combining in their persons the temporal power of sultan and the spiritual authority of caliph.

Sunnah. Custom; the practice of the Prophet and the early Islamic community that became an exemplary precedent for all Muslims.

Sunnis. Those who accept the sunnah and the historical succession of caliphs, as opposed to the Shi‘a; they are the majority of the Muslim community.

Sura. A chapter of the Quran.

Tahdiya. A period of calm, sometimes translated as a “cease-fire”; distinct from a longer-term truce arrangement known as a hudna (q.v.).

Tahrir. Literally “liberation”; name given to large central square in Cairo, Midan Tahrir, to commemorate the 1952 revolution.

Tariqah. A Sufi order or brotherhood.

Thawra. Literally “revolution.”

Timar. The land and tax revenues that the Ottoman state granted to a sipahi (q.v.) in return for his military service.

Torah. The Five Books of Moses, or the Pentateuch. It contains the laws God revealed to the Jews, including the Ten Commandments and other comprehensive instructions on the proper ordering of state and society. It also includes God's promise to Abraham and his descendants that He will give the Jews the land of Israel.

Ulama (sing. alim). Literally “those learned in the ways of Islam”; the collective term for the members of the Islamic religious establishment, including preachers, judges, teachers, scholars of religion, and administrators of the religious hierarchy.

Ummah. The universal Islamic community; in the twentieth century, the term also came to mean nation.

Vilayat-i faqih. The exercise of governmental authority by an Islamic jurist; this principle was incorporated in the constitution of the Islamic Republic of Iran in 1979.

Waqf. Property or other revenue-yielding source endowed for a religious institution or charity. During the later Ottoman period, the practice of endowing waqfs for the benefit of private families became widespread. The income from waqf was exempt from taxation.

Wasta. Refers to the contacts and connections required to find meaningful employment or to get things done quickly.

Yishuv. The name for the Jewish community in Palestine prior to the recognition of the modern state of Israel in 1948.

Za'im. Leader; the term is specifically used to designate the political notables, or bosses, of Lebanon.

Zakat. The fixed share of income or property that all Muslims must pay as an alms tax; one of the five pillars of Islam.

SELECT BIBLIOGRAPHY

This introductory bibliography of works in English is intended primarily to guide readers to the basic books on various aspects of Middle Eastern history. Each of the works listed here contains its own bibliography that readers seeking more specialized references may want to consult. The entries are more comprehensive for the period after 1800 than for the preceding centuries.

REFERENCE WORKS AND PERIODICALS

The Encyclopaedia of Islam, new ed. (Leiden, 1960–2006), with a changing editorial committee, has reached twelve volumes. This major scholarly undertaking not only concentrates on terms, important figures, and concepts of classical and medieval Islam but also pays some attention to modern developments. Reeva S. Simon, Philip Mattar, and Richard W. Bulliet, eds., The Encyclopedia of the Modern Middle East, 4 vols. (New York, 1996) is intended for the student and the educated layperson and contains entries on a variety of fields (politics, history, the arts) covering the area from Morocco through Afghanistan. Oxford Bibliographies offers a section on Islamic Studies that guides students through the resources available both in print and online for a large number of subjects. A helpful handbook of primary sources, including photographs, diary entries, and archival records, is Julia Clancy-Smith and Charles Smith, The Modern Middle East and North Africa: A History in Documents (Oxford, 2013).

The International Journal of Middle East Studies (New York) is the scholarly journal of the Middle East Studies Association. It is comprehensive and multidisciplinary, publishing articles that embrace the full chronological scope of Middle Eastern studies from the rise of Islam to the present. The British Journal of Middle Eastern Studies often carries thoughtful interpretive essays. The Middle East Journal (Washington, DC) treats contemporary affairs and foreign policy matters and contains useful chronological and bibliographical sections. Arab Studies Journal (Washington) and Middle Eastern Studies (London) concentrate on modern history. Middle East Report (New York) offers a critical, left-of-center approach to a broad range of current events. The periodical's challenging and sometimes controversial coverage offers a perspective often at odds with official Washington policy. In addition to the journals that provide regional treatment, various scholarly organizations publish periodicals on almost every country in the Middle East. Many of these are excellent.

For anyone seeking to follow current events in a systematic fashion, the Internet provides access to such essential newspapers as the New York Times, the Washington Post, the Economist, the Financial Times, and the Guardian as well as English-language editions of several daily and weekly publications originating in the Middle East such as Egypt's al Ahram, Israel's Haaretz, Lebanon's Daily Star, and al Hayat. There are also a growing number of valuable online blogs; among the best-informed and longest-standing are Juan Cole's Informed Comment and Joshua Landis's Syria Comment. Useful hubs for online commentary and analysis on the Middle East are foreignpolicy.com, jadaliyya.com, carnegieendowment.org, and pomeps.org (Project on Middle East Political Science, directed by Marc Lynch).

GENERAL WORKS ON ISLAM AND MIDDLE EASTERN HISTORY TO 1700

Four outstanding overviews of Arab and Islamic history are now available. Marshall G. S. Hodgson, The Venture of Islam: Conscience and History in a World Civilization, 3 vols. (Chicago, 1974), places Islam in a global context and is one of the most stimulating and challenging explorations of Islamic history yet written. Ira M. Lapidus, A History of Islamic Societies, 2nd ed. (New York, 2002), explores the shaping of Islamic civilization in all Islamic regions from the time of the Prophet to the twentieth century. Albert Hourani's masterful synthesis, A History of the Arab Peoples (Cambridge, MA, 2002, with a new afterword by Malise Ruthven), treats the entire Arab world, emphasizing the development of social patterns and institutions. Eugene Rogan's The Arabs: A History (New York, 2011) draws on the perspectives of eyewitness accounts to the main political and diplomatic transformations of the past five centuries. An additional survey of all the Islamic regions, John Obert Voll's Islam: Continuity and Change in the Modern World (Boulder, 1982), concentrates on the period after 1800. A comprehensive reassessment of the development of Islamic society is the stimulating work of Jonathan P. Berkey, The Formation of Islam: Religion and Society in the Near East, 600–1800 (Cambridge, 2003). Two excellent overviews are Francis Robinson, ed., The Cambridge Illustrated History of the Islamic World (Cambridge, 1996) and John Esposito, ed., The Oxford History of Islam (Oxford, 1999). Both works offer a combination of chronological and topical treatment in contributions from leading specialists; both are also handsomely illustrated and contain very fine bibliographical essays.

The Quran is the essential foundation for an understanding of Islam. The translation used in this book is A. J. Arberry, The Koran: Interpreted (New York, 1955). Introductions to the faith and institutions of Islam include Seyyed Hossein Nasr, Ideals and Realities of Islam (Boston, 1972); Fazlur Rahman, Islam, 2nd ed. (Chicago, 1979); Malise Ruthven, Islam in the World (New York, 1984); and Andrew Rippin, Muslims: Their Religious Beliefs and Practices, 4th ed. (London, 2012). A most helpful study of Shi'ism is Moojan Momen, An Introduction to Shi'i Islam: The History and Doctrines of Twelver Shi'ism (New Haven, 1985).

For historical surveys, Bernard Lewis, The Arabs in History, rev. ed. (New York, 1966), remains a graceful and accessible synthesis. A fresher examination can be found in Jacob Lassner and Michael Bonner, Islam in the Middle Ages: The Origins and Shaping of Classical Islamic Civilization (Santa Barbara, 2009). Marilyn R. Waldman presents a stimulating reappraisal of the periodization of Islamic history in her contribution, “The Islamic World,” New Encyclopaedia Britannica, 15th ed. (Chicago, 1990), pp. 102–133. In a similar vein is Richard M. Eaton’s Islamic History as Global History (Washington, DC, 1990), a historiographical essay in the American Historical Association’s series of studies on world and comparative history; Eaton’s essay should be required reading for all who seek to understand the global significance of the consolidation of an Islamic civilization. The chronological underpinnings of the first 900 years of Islamic Middle Eastern history are provided by Hugh Kennedy, The Prophet and the Age of the Caliphates: The Islamic Near East from the Sixth to the Eleventh Century (London, 1986) and P. M. Holt, The Age of the Crusaders: The Near East from the Eleventh Century to 1517 (London, 1986).

On Muhammad and the early community, Fred M. Donner’s Muhammad and the Believers: At the Origins of Islam (Cambridge, MA, 2010) is valuable, while the complexities of the interaction between Arabian Islam and its conquered territories are brought out in Fred M. Donner, The Early Islamic Conquests (Princeton, 1981) and Michael G. Morony, Iraq After the Muslim Conquest (Princeton, 1984). The development of the shari’ah and the schools of jurisprudence is examined in N. J. Coulson, The History of Islamic Law (Edinburgh, 1964), and Wael B. Hallaq, An Introduction to Islamic Law (Cambridge, 2009). The consolidation of ulama educational institutions in the eleventh and twelfth centuries is the subject of George Makdisi, The Rise of Colleges: Institutions of Higher Learning in Islam and the West (Edinburgh, 1982). Sufism is the subject of Annemarie Schimmel, Mystical Dimensions of Islam (Chapel Hill, 1975). An informative and well-documented discussion of the agricultural revolution brought about by the transmission of East Indian crops to the Mediterranean basin through the trading network established under the Abbasids is Andrew M. Watson, Agricultural Innovation in the Early Islamic World: The Diffusion of Crops and Farming Techniques, 700–1100 (Cambridge, 1983). Urban life and institutions are examined in Ira M. Lapidus, Muslim Cities in the Later Middle Ages (Cambridge, MA, 1967). One of the best surveys historical survey of the role of women in Middle Eastern Islamic societies is Leila Ahmed, Women and Gender in Islam: Historical Roots of a Modern Debate (New Haven, 1992); not the least of this work's virtues is the author's refusal to be drawn into the "because of Islam" mode of explanation and to insist on placing the development of the status of Muslim women within the wider context of pre-Islamic Near Eastern practices.

GENERAL WORKS ON POLITICAL, SOCIAL, AND ECONOMIC HISTORY IN THE MODERN ERA

The two principal works on economic history are Roger Owen, The Middle East in the World Economy, 1800–1914 (London, 1981), and Charles Issawi, An Economic History of the Middle East and North Africa (New York, 1982). Owen is arranged chronologically and by region and concentrates on Egypt and the Ottoman Empire; Issawi's organization is thematic, and he covers the area from Morocco through Iran. Issawi has also compiled four books of documents, readings, and commentary that are extremely valuable: The Economic History of the Middle East, 1800–1914 (Chicago, 1966), which is primarily concerned with the Arab world; The Economic History of Iran, 1800–1914 (Chicago, 1971); The Economic History of Turkey, 1800–1914 (Chicago, 1980), which deals with the Ottoman Empire; and The Fertile Crescent, 1800–1914: A Documentary Economic History (New York, 1988). An important analysis of social and economic trends is Alan Richards and John Waterbury, A Political Economy of the Middle East: State, Class, and Economic Development (Boulder, 1990). Roger Owen and Sevket Pamuk, A History of Middle East Economies in the Twentieth Century (London, 1998), is a very good introductory survey with both a country-specific and regional focus.

Roger Owen, State, Power and Politics in the Making of the Modern Middle East, 3rd ed. (London, 2004), employs a combination of narrative and thematic approaches to produce a sophisticated introductory political study of the region from World War I to the present. A masterful synthesis of the post-Ottoman period to the mid-1990s is Avi Shlaim, War and Peace in the Middle East: A Concise History, rev. ed. (New York, 1995). For studies of elites and politics, see Michael C. Hudson, Arab Politics: The Search for Legitimacy (New Haven, 1977), which, in addition to its analysis of contemporary regimes, provides sound historical background on the formation of the modern Arab states. At the opposite end of the economic spectrum are the ordinary people whose lives are the subject of Edmund Burke III and David Yaghoubian, eds., Struggle and Survival in the Modern Middle East, 2nd ed. (Berkeley, 2005). Augustus Richard Norton, ed., Civil Society in the Middle East, 2 vols. (Leiden, 1995 and 1996), is an enormous undertaking that seeks to examine most of the countries of the Middle East and North Africa within the analytical framework of civil society, a concept on which the contributors do not have a shared definition but one that has nonetheless enabled them to produce some very important case studies of specific countries in the contemporary era.

A rich collection of essays dealing with such themes as religion and gender, state and family, and the emergence of women's movements is Margaret Meriwether and Judith Tucker, eds., Social History of Women in the Modern Middle East (Boulder, 1999). The book contains extensive bibliographical entries. A major reference guide for works on women's history written since 1990 is Nikki Keddie, "Women in the Limelight: Some Recent Books on Middle Eastern Women's History," International Journal of Middle East Studies, vol. 34 (August 2002), pp. 553–573.

THE OTTOMAN EMPIRE AND TURKEY

General Surveys and Specific Works on the Ottoman Empire to 1800

A concise analysis of Ottoman history and institutions from the foundation of the empire to the late eighteenth century is Norman Itzkowitz, The Ottoman Empire and Islamic Tradition (New York, 1972). Halil Inalcik, The Ottoman Empire: The Classical Age, 1300–1600 (London, 1973), is an essential work on political, economic, and religious institutions. Daniel Goffman's The Ottoman Empire and Early Modern Europe (Cambridge, 2002) reviews the historiography on the subject and provides an excellent annotated bibliography. A dauntingly thorough examination of the Ottoman centuries with rather less treatment of Turkey than is implied in the title is Stanford J. Shaw and Ezel Kural Shaw, History of the Ottoman Empire and Modern Turkey, 2 vols. (Cambridge, MA, 1976, 1977). Roderic H. Davison, Turkey (Englewood Cliffs, NJ, 1968), is a very fine introductory survey that, in this case, delivers far more than the title promises: It treats the entire Ottoman era and is particularly strong on the nineteenth century. The most comprehensive and sophisticated social analysis of the entire Ottoman era is Halil Inalcik and Donald Quataert, eds., An Economic and Social History of the Ottoman Empire, 1300–1914 (Cambridge, 1994). In The Imperial Harem: Women and Sovereignty in the Ottoman Empire (New York, 1993), Leslie Pierce has written a major revisionist interpretation of the political role of women in the Ottoman court; additional contributions on women's activities during the Ottoman period are found in Madeline C. Zilfi, Women in the Ottoman Empire: Middle Eastern Women in the Early Modern Era (Leiden, 1997). The non-Muslim communities of the empire are examined in Benjamin Braude and Bernard Lewis, eds., Christians and Jews in the Ottoman Empire: The Functioning of a Plural Society, 2 vols. (New York, 1982), and the impact of and response to Ottoman rule in Europe is surveyed in L. S. Stavrianos, The Balkans Since 1453 (New York, 1958). The grandeur and beauty of Ottoman architecture is captured in the text and illustrations of Godfrey Goodwin, A History of Ottoman Architecture (Baltimore, 1971). Alan Mikhail, Nature and Empire in Ottoman Egypt: An Environmental History (Cambridge, 2012), examines Ottoman rule in the lucrative province of Egypt through the lens of natural resource management.

From the Nineteenth Century to the End of the Empire

Bernard Lewis, The Emergence of Modern Turkey, 2nd ed. (London, 1968), treats the institutional and cultural impact of the reform movement from its beginnings through the Atatürk years. Donald Quataert, The Ottoman Empire, 1700–1922 (Cambridge, 2000), offers new perspectives on the era of transformation. Other works that examine this period with a more limited focus include Stanford J. Shaw's detailed study, Between Old and New: The Ottoman Empire Under Selim III, 1789–1807 (Cambridge, MA, 1971); Roderic H. Davison's examination of the Tanzimat era, Reform in the Ottoman Empire, 1856–1876 (Princeton, 1963); Niyazi Berkes, The Development of Secularism in Turkey (Montreal, 1964), which is particularly strong on ideological currents; Serif Mardin, The Genesis of Young Ottoman Thought: A Study in the Modernization of Turkish Political Ideas (Princeton, 1962); and two later and rather differently focused works by Carter V. Findley, Bureaucratic Reform in the Ottoman Empire: The Sublime Porte, 1789–1922 (Princeton, 1980) and Ottoman Civil Officialdom: A Social History (Princeton, 1989). Two significant reassessments of aspects of Abdulhamid II's reign are Selim Deringil, The Well-Protected Domains: Ideology and the Legitimation of Power in the Ottoman Empire 1876–1909 (London, 1998), and Benjamin C. Fortna, Imperial Classroom: Islam, the State, and Education in the Late Ottoman Empire (Oxford, 2002). Important contributions on the role of the Ottoman—as well as the Egyptian, Iranian, and North African—religious establishment during the nineteenth-century transformation are found in Nikki R. Keddie, ed., Scholars, Saints, and Sufis: Muslim Religious Institutions in the Middle East Since 1500 (Berkeley, 1972). A gap in the scholarly literature of the Ottoman transformation has been admirably filled by Zeynep Çelik, The Remaking of Istanbul: Portrait of an Ottoman City in the Nineteenth Century (Seattle, 1986).

Studies that approach Ottoman transformation through the detrimental impact of the penetration of European capital into the imperial domains include Sevket Pamuk, The Ottoman Empire and European Capitalism, 1820–1913: Trade, Investment, and Production (New York, 1987); Reçat Kasaba, The Ottoman Empire and the World Economy: The Nineteenth Century (Albany, 1988); and Huri Islamoglu-Inan, ed., The Ottoman Empire and the World Economy (Cambridge, 1987), in which the editor's introductory essay is especially helpful. Donald Quataert has addressed a long-standing gap in Ottoman studies in his Ottoman Manufacturing in the Age of the Industrial Revolution (Cambridge, 1993).

The diplomacy of the Eastern question is thoroughly covered, though from a decidedly European perspective, in M. S. Anderson, The Eastern Question, 1774–1923 (New York, 1966). A fresh look at the Eastern Question, with a useful reminder that the Middle Eastern participants could manipulate diplomatic crises to their own benefit, is L. Carl Brown's lively International Politics and the Middle East: Old Rules, Dangerous Game (Princeton, 1984). A comprehensive collection of treaties, decrees, and diplomatic communications is J. C. Hurewitz, ed., The Middle East and North Africa in World Politics: A Documentary Record: vol. 1, European Expansion, 1535–1914, 2nd ed. (New Haven, 1975), and vol. 2, British-French Supremacy, 1914–1945 (New Haven, 1979).

The politics of the Arab lands under Ottoman administration is examined in P. M. Holt, Egypt and the Fertile Crescent, 1516–1922: A Political History (Ithaca, 1969). For the impact of the reform movement on the Arab provinces, see Moshe Ma'oz, Ottoman Reform in Syria and Palestine, 1840–1861: The Impact of the Tanzimat on Politics and Society (Oxford, 1968); Engin Akarli, The Long Peace: Ottoman Lebanon, 1861–1920 (Berkeley, 1993); and William R. Polk and Richard L. Chambers, eds., Beginnings of Modernization in the Middle East: The Nineteenth Century (Chicago, 1968), which contains Albert Hourani's seminal article "Ottoman Reform and the Politics of Notables." Works published after 1980 tend to focus on social and economic history; among them are Philip S. Khoury, Urban Notables and Arab Nationalism: The Politics of Damascus, 1860–1920 (Cambridge, 1983); Linda Shatkowski Schilcher, Families in Politics: Damascus Factions and Estates of the 18th and 19th Centuries (Stuttgart, 1985); Leila Tarazi Fawaz, Merchants and Migrants in Nineteenth Century Beirut (Cambridge, MA, 1983); Beshara Doumani, Rediscovering Palestine: The Merchants and Peasants of Jabal Nablus, 1700–1900 (Berkeley, 1995), which demonstrates the resilience and adaptability of a particular local economy in the face of Ottoman centralization and European commercial expansion; Dina Rizk Khoury, State and Provincial Society in the Ottoman Empire: Mosul, 1540–1834 (Cambridge, 1997), which also shows the adaptive vibrancy of provincial economic life during a period once viewed as stagnant; Eugene L. Rogan, Frontiers of the State in the Late Ottoman Empire: Transjordan, 1850–1921 (Cambridge, 1999); and Martha Mundy and Richard Saumarez Smith, Governing Property, Making the Modern State: Law, Administration and Production in Ottoman Syria (London, 2007). David Dean Commins, Islamic Reform: Politics and Social Change in Late Ottoman Syria (New York, 1990), examines social and intellectual currents among the Damascus ulama at the turn of the century. Studies of Ottoman Arabia include William Ochsenwald, Religion, Society, and the State in Arabia: The Hijaz Under Ottoman Control, 1804–1908 (Columbus, 1984), and Thomas Kuehn, Empire, Islam, and Politics of Difference: Ottoman Rule in Yemen, 1849–1919 (Leiden, 2011), which considers Ottoman expansion against the backdrop of European imperial strategies.

One of the most significant contributions to the scholarship of the important Young Turk era is Hasan Kayali, Arabs and Young Turks: Ottomanism, Arabism, and Islamism in the Ottoman Empire, 1908–1918 (Berkeley, 1997), a work of historical revisionism that argues that the CUP was committed to Ottomanism and did not adopt a policy of Turkification. Feroz Ahmad, The Young Turks: The Committee of Union and Progress in Turkish Politics, 1908–1914 (Oxford, 1969), is a study of the power struggles between the CUP and its opponents. The first articulation of Turkish nationalist sentiments is examined in Uriel Heyd, Foundations of Turkish Nationalism: The Life and Teachings of Ziya Gökalp (London, 1950), and Niyazi Berkes, ed. and trans., Turkish Nationalism and Western Civilization: Selected Essays of Ziya Gökalp (London, 1959).

Numerous works exist on the Arab attitude toward the Ottoman government during the Young Turk period. The pioneering study by George Antonius, The Arab Awakening: The Story of the Arab National Movement (London, 1938, and several subsequent editions), overestimates the pre-World War I force of Arab nationalism and anti-Ottoman sentiments but remains an eloquent statement of the Arab case from the perspective of the interwar era. C. Ernest Dawn's From Ottomanism to Arabism: Essays on the Origins of Arab Nationalism (Urbana, 1973) analyzes the social, economic, and political factors that led the majority of the Arab elite to support Ottomanism during World War I. Rashid Khalidi et al., eds., The Origins of Arab Nationalism (New York, 1991), offers a reappraisal of the subject, focusing on the late Ottoman period. An absorbing re-imagination of the Ottoman landscape prior to its postwar political fragmentation is Raja Shehadeh's A Rift in Time: Travels with My Ottoman Uncle (London, 2010).

Drawing heavily on Ottoman and Arab resources, Eugene Rogan's The Fall of the Ottomans: The Great War in the Middle East (New York, 2015) provides a compelling account of the impact of World War I on the Ottoman Empire; local experiences are also captured by Leila Tarazi Fawaz's A Land of Aching Hearts: The Middle East in the Great War (Cambridge, MA, 2014). The interests of the major powers, including the Ottoman Empire, during World War I are surveyed in Marion Kent, ed., The Great Powers and the End of the Ottoman Empire (London, 1984). Britain's role in shaping the wartime agreements and the postwar settlement is carefully examined in Elie Kedourie, England and the Middle East: The Destruction of the Ottoman Empire, 1914–1921 (London, 1987). The same subject is presented in David Fromkin's highly readable account A Peace to End All Peace: The Fall of the Ottoman Empire and the Creation of the Modern Middle East (New York, 1990) and Jonathan Schneer's The Balfour Declaration (New York, 2010), which sets the controversial promise into its wider historical context. Detailed diplomatic histories of Britain's pursuit of its Indian and Persian Gulf interests are Briton Cooper Busch, Britain and the Persian Gulf, 1894–1914 (Berkeley, 1967), and the same author's Britain, India, and the Arabs, 1914–1921 (Berkeley, 1971). The decline of Ottoman rule in the Gulf is treated in Frederick F. Anscombe, The Ottoman Gulf: The Creation of Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, and Qatar (New York, 1997). An account of Britain's efforts to organize the Middle East and an expression of regret at Britain's failure is Elizabeth Monroe, Britain's Moment in the Middle East, 1914–1971, 2nd ed. (London, 1981), while French objectives are treated in Christopher M. Andrew and A. S. Kenya-Forstner, The Climax of French Imperial Expansion, 1914–1924 (Stanford, 1981). D. K. Fieldhouse's Western Imperialism in the Middle East, 1914–1958 (Oxford, 2006) offers a major synthesis of existing scholarship. L. Carl Brown, ed., Imperial Legacy: The Ottoman Imprint on the Balkans and the Middle East (New York, 1996), is a collection of essays examining various aspects of the lasting institutional and ideological influence of the Ottoman centuries.

The history of the Armenian community before, during, and immediately after the war is recounted in Richard G. Hovannisian, Armenia on the Road to Independence, 1918 (Berkeley, 1967), and The Republic of Armenia (Berkeley, 1971). Two of the most important books on the Armenian genocide published upon its centenary are Ronald Suny, “They Can Live in the Desert but Nowhere Else”: A History of the Armenian Genocide (Princeton, 2015), and Taner Akçam, The Young Turks' Crime Against Humanity: The Armenian Genocide and Ethnic Cleansing in the Ottoman Empire (Princeton, 2012), which draws on previously inaccessible Ottoman documents to examine the dying empire's plan for the demographic transformation of Anatolia.

The Turkish Republic

A thorough political history from the end of the empire to the early 1990s is Feroz Ahmad, The Making of Modern Turkey (London, 1993). An excellent interpretive account is Eric J. Zürcher, Turkey: A Modern History, 3rd ed. (London, 2005), which demonstrates the continuities between the Young Turk and Republican periods. The major study of Atatürk and his era is Andrew Mango, Atatürk: The Biography of the Founder of Modern Turkey (Woodstock and New York, 2000), which contains a wealth of detail, some of it more critical than has been the norm. Still useful is Lord Kinross, Atatürk: A Biography of Mustafa Kemal, Father of Modern Turkey (New York, 1965). Gavin Brockett's How Happy to Call Oneself a Turk: Provincial Newspapers and the Negotiation of a Muslim National Identity (Austin, 2011) considers the role of the post-1945 national print culture in extending the processes of nation building beyond the narrow dictates of the elite.

On the introduction of political pluralism after World War II, the pioneering study is Kemal Karpat, Turkey's Politics: The Transition to a Multiparty System (Princeton, 1959). It may be supplemented by Feroz Ahmad, The Turkish Experiment in Democracy, 1950–1975 (Boulder, 1977), and William Hale, The Political and Economic Development of Turkey (New York, 1981). Walter F. Weiker, The Modernization of Turkey: From Atatürk to the Present Day (New York, 1981), emphasizes developments during the 1960s and 1970s and includes valuable statistical tables. Frank Tachau, Turkey: The Politics of Authority, Democracy, and Development (New York, 1984), treats the years from 1950 to 1980 in the thematic terms of the title, employing modernization as an analytical device. Dankwart A. Rustow, Turkey: America's Forgotten Ally (New York, 1987), offers a succinct assessment of Turkey in the 1970s and early 1980s; the analysis is soundly placed in the context of late Ottoman and early republican history. An important examination of Turkey's changing political culture and foreign policy orientation since the end of the cold war is Heinz Kramer, A Changing Turkey: The Challenge to Europe and the United States (Washington, DC, 2000). A sympathetic account of the entire Kurdish region is David McDowall, A Modern History of the Kurds (London, 1996); for an analysis of Turkish-Kurdish conflict, also see Robert Olson, ed., The Kurdish Nationalist Movement in the 1990s: Its Impact on Turkey and the Middle East (Lexington, 1996).

EGYPT

A comprehensive treatment of modern Egypt is M. W. Daly, ed., The Cambridge History of Egypt: vol. 2, Modern Egypt, from 1517 to the End of the Twentieth Century (Cambridge, 1998), which incorporates recent historical interpretations in a series of chronologically ordered chapters by leading experts. A skillful combination of synthesis and substance makes James Jankowski, Egypt: A Short History (Oxford, 2000), an excellent introductory survey. Although not without its biases, P. J. Vatikiotis, The History of Modern Egypt: From Muhammad Ali to Mubarak, 4th ed. (Baltimore, 1991), remains an important survey.

The Nineteenth Century to 1952

The important Muhammad Ali era is authoritatively examined in Khaled Fahmy, All the Pasha's Men: Mehmed Ali, His Army, and the Making of Modern Egypt (Cambridge, 1997), a work that draws on a rich variety of Egyptian archival sources to examine Muhammad Ali's army from several different perspectives, ranging from the soldiers who resisted serving in it to the state that used it as an instrument of coercion. See also Afaf Lutfi al-Sayyid Marsot, Egypt in the Reign of Muhammad Ali (Cambridge, 1984), and J. Heyworth-Dunne, An Introduction to the History of Education in Modern Egypt (London, 1939, 1968), which is still valuable for its account of the educational missions to Europe. Studies that use Muhammad Ali's reforms as the starting point for more extended treatment of nineteenth-century Egypt include Roger Owen, Cotton and the Egyptian Economy, 1820–1914 (Oxford, 1969); Gabriel Baer, Studies in the Social History of Modern Egypt (Chicago, 1969); and Judith Tucker, Women in Nineteenth Century Egypt (Cambridge, 1985).

F. Robert Hunter, Egypt Under the Khedives, 1805–1879: From Household Government to Modern Bureaucracy (Pittsburgh, 1984), is an important archival-based study on the evolution of governing institutions and the behavior of appointed officials. The Urabi rebellion is examined in Juan R. I. Cole, Colonialism and Revolution in the Middle East: Social and Cultural Origins of Egypt's Urabi Movement (Princeton, 1993). The financial practices that contributed to Egypt's bankruptcy are examined in David Landes, Bankers and Pashas: International Finance and Economic Imperialism in Egypt (Cambridge, MA, 1958). Egypt's pivotal role in the European scramble for colonies is treated in Ronald Robinson and John Gallagher, Africa and the Victorians: The Official Mind of Imperialism (New York, 1961).

An analysis of the changes introduced during the British occupation is Robert L. Tignor, Modernization and British Colonial Rule in Egypt, 1882–1914 (Princeton, 1966). The voice of Victorian imperialism rings loud and clear in Lord Cromer, Modern Egypt, 2 vols. (London, 1908). A critical study of Cromer and his policies is found in Afaf Lutfi al-Sayyid Marsot, Egypt and Cromer: A Study in Anglo-Egyptian Relations (London, 1968), while a full-length biography is provided by Roger Owen, Lord Cromer: Victorian Imperialist, Edwardian Proconsul (Oxford, 2004). Changes in the judicial system and the rise of the legal profession are examined in Donald M. Reid, Lawyers and Politics in the Arab World, 1880–1960 (Minneapolis, 1981), and Farhat J. Ziadeh, Lawyers, the Rule of Law, and Liberalism in Modern Egypt (Stanford, 1968). The starting point for studying the turn-of-the-century intellectual ferment in which Egypt played a leading part is the relevant chapters in Albert Hourani, Arabic Thought in the Liberal Age, 1789–1939 (Oxford, 1970). More specialized works include Nadav Safran, Egypt in Search of Political Community: An Analysis of the Intellectual and Political Evolution of Egypt, 1804–1952 (Cambridge, MA, 1961); Jamal Mohammed Ahmed, The Intellectual Origins of Egyptian Nationalism (London, 1960); Nikki R. Keddie, Sayyid Jamal al-Din "al-Afghani" (Berkeley, 1972); and Malcolm H. Kerr, Islamic Reform: The Political and Legal Theories of Muhammad Abduh and Rashid Rida (Berkeley, 1966).

British policy in the years immediately after World War I is studied in John Darwin, Britain, Egypt, and the Middle East: Imperial Policy in the Aftermath of War, 1918–1922 (New York, 1981). Egypt's interwar era has attracted considerable scholarly attention; for the politics of the period, see Marius Deeb, Party Politics in Egypt: The Wafd and Its Rivals (London, 1979), and Afaf Lutfi al-Sayyid Marsot, Egypt's Liberal Experiment: 1922–1936 (Berkeley, 1977). The attempts by Egyptian entrepreneurs to overcome the disadvantages posed by the Capitulations are examined in Eric Davis, Challenging Colonialism: Bank Misr and Egyptian Industrialization, 1920–1941 (Princeton, 1983), and Robert Vitalis, When Capitalists Collide: Business Conflict and the End of Empire in Egypt (Berkeley, 1995). The emergence of an organized labor movement and the role of workers in the politics of Egyptian nationalism are treated in a very fine study by Joel Beinin and Zachary Lockman, Workers on the Nile: Nationalism, Communism, Islam, and the Egyptian Working Class, 1882–1954 (Princeton, 1987). The debate over Egypt's identity is analyzed in Israel Gershoni and James P. Jankowski, Egypt, Islam, and the Arabs: The Search for Egyptian Nationhood, 1900–1930 (New York, 1986), and the same authors' Redefining the Egyptian Nation, 1930–1945 (Cambridge, 1995). Margot Badran, Feminists, Islam, and Nation: Gender and the Making of Modern Egypt (Princeton, 1995), focuses on the women's movement from the turn of the century to 1952 as represented by activists from the upper classes of society, and Beth Baron, Egypt as Woman: Nationalism, Gender, and Politics (Berkeley, 2007), examines gender politics in the interwar period. A well-documented study of that class's self-perceptions and its economic, political, and social role is Magda S. Baraka, The Egyptian Upper Class Between Revolutions, 1919–1952 (Reading, UK, 1998). Education in the nineteenth century is described by Paul Sedra, From Mission to Modernity: Evangelicals, Reformers and Education in Nineteenth-Century Egypt (London, 2011), while Yoav Di-Capua, Gatekeepers of the Arab Past: Historians and History Writing in Twentieth-Century Egypt (Berkeley, 2009), examines the evolution of Egyptian historiography and its relation to colonialism. The influence of a national university on Egypt's political and intellectual life is the subject of Donald Malcolm Reid, Cairo University and the Making of Modern Egypt (Cambridge, 1990). The best studies of the Muslim Brotherhood are Richard P. Mitchell, The Society of the Muslim Brothers (London, 1969), and Carrie Rosefsky Wickham, The Muslim Brotherhood: Evolution of an Islamist Movement (Princeton, 2013), which traces its evolution to the elections of 2011–2012. On World War II in Egypt and the rest of the region, see George Kirk, The Middle East in the War (London, 1952). British policy in the immediate postwar era is thoroughly documented in Wm. Roger Louis, The British Empire in the Middle East, 1945–1951: Arab Nationalism, the United States, and Postwar Imperialism (Oxford, 1984). A particularly exciting and challenging approach to the creation of the Egyptian economy under colonial rule and beyond is provided in various case studies included in Timothy Mitchell, Rule of Experts: Egypt, Techno-Politics, Modernity (Berkeley, 2002).

Anglo-Sudanese-Egyptian relations from the establishment of the condominium to Sudanese independence are thoroughly examined in M. W. Daly's two-volume study, Empire on the Nile: The Anglo-Egyptian Sudan, 1898–1934 (Cambridge, 1986) and Imperial Sudan: The Anglo-Egyptian Condominium, 1934–1956 (Cambridge, 1991). The complex relationships between imperialist practices and the construction of national identities are thoroughly discussed by Heather Sharkey, Living with Colonialism: Nationalism and Culture in the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan (Berkeley, 2003), and Eve Troutt Powell, A Different Shade of Colonialism: Egypt, Great Britain, and the Mastery of the Sudan (Berkeley, 2003).

From the Revolution of 1952

A good introductory overview is Derek Hopwood, Egypt: Politics and Society, 1945–1984 (London, 1985). Among the many attempts to explain the Nasser era by studying the life of its dominant personality, P. J. Vatikiotis, Nasser and His Generation (New York, 1978); Jean Lacouture, Nasser: A Biography (New York, 1973); and Robert Stephens, Nasser (London, 1971), may be recommended. There are several good books on foreign policy matters; Egypt's relations with other Arab states are treated in A. I. Dawisha, Egypt and the Arab World: The Elements of Foreign Policy (New York, 1976), and Malcolm H. Kerr, The Arab Cold War: Gamal Abd al-Nasir and His Rivals, 1958–1970, 3rd ed. (London, 1971).

The Egyptian-Soviet relationship is examined in Karen Dawisha, Soviet Foreign Policy Towards Egypt (New York, 1979), and Alvin Rubinstein, Red Star on the Nile: The Soviet-Egyptian Influence Relationship Since the June War (Princeton, 1977). The Suez crisis has received extensive treatment, and the following works are but a sampling of the material available: Kennett Love, Suez—The Twice-Fought War: A History (New York, 1969); Keith Kyle, Suez: Britain's End of Empire in the Middle East, new ed. (London, 2003); Michael T. Thornhill, Road to Suez: The Battle of the Canal Zone (Stroud, 2006); and Wm. Roger Louis and Roger Owen, eds., Suez 1956: The Crisis and Its Consequences (Oxford, 1989), which is a reassessment based on new documentary evidence. The 1967 war is analyzed in Nadav Safran, From War to War: The Arab-Israeli Confrontation, 1948–1967 (New York, 1969). One of the best analyses of the circumstances leading up to the 1967 war is Richard B. Parker, The Politics of Miscalculation in the Middle East (Bloomington, 1993). The same author's edited collection, The Six Day War: A Retrospective (Gainesville, 1996), offers valuable perspectives on the policies and motivations of the belligerents and the major outside powers, as does the more recent The 1967 Arab-Israeli War: Origins and Consequences (Cambridge, 2012), edited by Wm. Roger Louis and Avi Shlaim.

A survey of economic change as a whole is Robert Mabro, The Egyptian Economy, 1952–1972 (Oxford, 1974). Land reform is treated in Gabriel S. Saab, The Egyptian Agrarian Reform, 1952–1962 (London, 1967). The uneven results of the land reform are studied in Leonard Binder, In a Moment of Enthusiasm: Political Power and the Second Stratum in Egypt (Chicago, 1978); Hamied Ansari, Egypt: The Stalled Society (Albany, 1986); and Robert Springborg, Family, Power, and Politics in Egypt: Sayed Bey Marei—His Clan, Clients, and Cohorts (Philadelphia, 1982), a fascinating account of how a member of the pre-1952 landed class retained his wealth and political influence during the Nasser and Sadat eras. Cynthia Nelson, Doria Shafik, Egyptian Feminist: A Woman Apart (Gainesville, FL, 1996), is a superb study of a Parisian-educated activist who ought to have been welcomed by the Nasser regime but was instead persecuted by it. A thorough and critical assessment of state policies for three decades after 1952 is found in John Waterbury, The Egypt of Nasser and Sadat: The Political Economy of Two Regimes (Princeton, 1983). See also Kirk J.

Beattie, Egypt During the Nasser Years: Ideology, Politics, and Civil Society (Boulder, 1994).

Sadat is the subject of a scathing biography by Irene Beeson and David Hirst, Sadat (London, 1981); a more sympathetic approach is taken in the detailed political study by Kirk J. Beattie, Egypt During the Sadat Years (New York, 2000). Sadat staked his own claim to a place in history in a self-serving autobiography, In Search of Identity (New York, 1978). William B. Quandt, Camp David: Peacemaking and Politics (Washington, DC, 1986), is a thorough discussion of the intricacies involved in securing the Camp David Accords. Useful discussions of the variety of the issues faced by the Sadat regime can be found in John Waterbury, Egypt: Burdens of the Past, Options for the Future (Bloomington, 1978), and Robert Tignor, Anwar al-Sadat: Transforming the Middle East (Oxford, 2015). The politicization of students under Nasser and Sadat is discussed in Ahmed Abdallah, The Student Movement and National Politics in Egypt (London, 1985). An excellent account of the Islamic opposition is Gilles Kepel, The Prophet and Pharaoh: Muslim Extremism in Egypt, trans. Jon Rothschild (London, 1985). An important study that portrays the Islamist revival of the 1990s as permanent and moderate is Geneive Abdo, No God but God: Egypt and the Triumph of Islam (Oxford, 2000).

Robert Springborg, Mubarak's Egypt: Fragmentation of the Political Order (Boulder, 1989), examines the relationship between political authority and economic change during the early years of Mubarak's presidency, and Tamir Moustafa, The Struggle for Constitutional Power: Law, Politics, and Economic Development in Egypt (Cambridge, 2007), analyses the important and complex role played by the supreme constitutional court. The best accounts of the later stages of Mubarak's protracted rule and the revolutionary events that followed can be found in Roger Owen's The Rise and Fall of Arab Presidents for Life (Cambridge, MA, 2012), which analyzes the similarities in the structures of all Arab presidential regimes; Joshua Stacher, Adaptable Autocrats: Regime Power in Egypt and Syria (Stanford, 2012); Hazem Kandil, Soldiers, Spies and Statesmen: Egypt's Road to Revolt (London, 2012); and Jeannie Sowers and Chris Toensing, eds., The Journey to Tahrir: Revolution, Protest, and Social Change in Egypt (London, 2012).

SYRIA

For a general history, see A. L. Tibawi, A Modern History of Syria Including Lebanon and Palestine (New York, 1969). Previous studies of the mandate era have been superseded by Philip S. Khoury's splendid work, Syria and the French Mandate: The Politics of Arab Nationalism, 1920–1945 (Princeton, 1987), but the insights in Albert Hourani, Syria and Lebanon: A Political Essay (London, 1946), remain valuable. A challenging and original study of the emergence of a colonial civic order using gender as a primary analytical tool is Elizabeth Thompson, Colonial Citizens: Republican Rights, Paternal Privilege, and Gender in French Syria and Lebanon (New York, 2000). A compact introductory survey of the period since independence is Derek Hopwood, Syria, 1945–1986: Politics and Society (London, 1988). The impact on Syrian politics of Nasser's Pan-Arab policies during the 1950s is treated in Patrick Seale, The Struggle for Syria: A Study of Post-War Arab Politics, 1945–1958, new ed. (New Haven, 1987). Nikolaos van Dam, The Struggle for Power in Syria: Politics and Society Under Asad and the Ba'th Party, 4th ed. (New York, 2011), analyzes the role played by sectarian loyalties, while the Muslim Brotherhood's long history of struggle with the al-Asad regime is described in detail by Raphaël LeFèvre, Ashes of Hama: The Muslim Brotherhood in Syria (Oxford, 2013). Raymond A. Hinnebusch has written several works on the Ba'thist period, the most ambitious of which is Authoritarian Power and State Formation in Ba'thist Syria: Army, Party, and Peasant (Boulder, 1990), a work that provides a political science perspective on the period 1950–1980. More succinct is the same author's Syria: Revolution from Above (London, 2001), which focuses on the formation of the Syrian state from the early 1960s to the death of Hafiz al-Asad in 2000. The regionalist doctrine of the Syrian Social Nationalist Party is examined in Labib Zuwiyya-Yamak, The Syrian Social Nationalist Party: An Ideological Analysis (Cambridge, MA, 1966). A sympathetic portrait of Hafiz al-Asad is provided in the biography by Patrick Seale, Asad of Syria: The Struggle for the Middle East (Berkeley, 1989). An assessment of the Syrian president's policies and objectives is found in Moshe Ma'oz, Asad, the Sphinx of Damascus: A Political Biography (London, 1988), and Bassam Haddad, Business Networks in Syria: The Political Economy of Authoritarian Resilience (Stanford, 2012), explains the evolution of Syria's collusive political economy. The accession to power by Bashar al-Assad is examined by Volker Perthes, Syria Under Bashar al-Assad: Modernisation and the Limits of Change (Oxford, 2004), while David Lesch's Syria: The Fall of the House of Assad (Princeton, 2012) draws on considerable personal experience to assess the regime's determined efforts to stay in power. The complexities of Syria's ongoing civil war are examined by Charles Lister, The Syrian Jihad: Al-Qaeda, the Islamic State and the Evolution of an Insurgency (Oxford, 2015).

LEBANON

The best historical survey of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries is Kamal S. Salibi, The Modern History of Lebanon (New York, 1965). Any bibliography of modern Lebanon must also include Elizabeth Picard's instructive and deeply engaged work, Lebanon: A Shattered Country. Myths and Realities of the Wars in Lebanon, trans. Franklin Philip (New York, 1996). An informative collection of essays on the working of the Lebanese system before the civil war is Leonard Binder, ed., Politics in Lebanon (New York, 1966). Michael Hudson, The Precarious Republic (New York, 1968), shows some of the stresses within the political structure at a time when others were holding it up as a model of sectarian harmony. For developments leading up to the first phase of the civil war, one should consult Kamal S. Salibi, Cross Roads to Civil War: Lebanon, 1958–1976 (Delmar, NY, 1976). An important interpretation of Lebanon's domestic situation as well as its place in the Middle East during the 1970s is Walid Khalidi, Conflict and Violence in Lebanon: Confrontation in the Middle East (Cambridge, MA, 1979). An analysis of Israel's 1982 invasion is found in Itamar Rabinovich, The War for Lebanon, 1970–1985, rev. ed. (Ithaca, 1985). Helena Cobban, The Making of Modern Lebanon (London, 1985), is especially helpful for its coherent narrative of the years from the outbreak of the civil war to the immediate aftermath of the Israeli invasion. Among the several specific accounts of the civil war, useful perspectives are offered in Jonathan C. Randal, Going All the Way: Christian Warlords, Israeli Adventurers, and the War in Lebanon (New York, 1983), which is highly critical of the Maronites; Robert Fisk, Pity the Nation: The Abduction of Lebanon (New York, 1990), an account by an engaged observer who remained in the country throughout the turmoil; and Thomas L. Friedman, From Beirut to Jerusalem (New York, 1989), which contains effective anecdotes by the New York Times correspondent. Kamal Salibi, A House of Many Mansions: The History of Lebanon Reconsidered (Berkeley, 1988), examines the conflicting historical myths on which the various religious communities base their vision of Lebanon. The political awakening of the Shi'a and the complexities of southern Lebanon are examined in Augustus Richard Norton, Amal and the Shi'a: Struggle for the Soul of Lebanon (Austin, 1987), and again in Hezbollah: A Short History (Princeton, 2007). Judith Palmer Harik, Hezbollah: The Changing Face of Terrorism (London, 2004), describes how well embedded the movement has become through its provision of public services.

IRAQ

The best historical survey of Iraq is the very fine work by Charles Tripp, A History of Iraq (Cambridge, 2000). See also Phebe Marr, The Modern History of Iraq (Boulder, 1985). One of the most significant historical studies of any modern Middle Eastern state is Hanna Batatu, The Old Social Classes and the Revolutionary Movements of Iraq: A Study of Iraq's Old Landed and Commercial Classes and of Its Communists, Ba'thists, and Free Officers (Princeton, 1982); Batatu's book is not for the beginner. Yitzhak Nakash, The Shi'is of Iraq (Princeton, 1994), is a comprehensive and revisionist study of the subject from the mid-eighteenth century to 1958. Edith Penrose and E. F. Penrose, Iraq: International Relations and National Development (London, 1978), deals with the mandate through the revolutionary era and is especially strong on economics and the petroleum industry. Of the three books on Iraq by Majid Khadduri, the first, which examines the period from formal independence to the overthrow of the monarchy, is the best; it is Independent Iraq, 1932–1958: A Study in Iraqi Politics, 2nd ed. (London, 1960). The process of setting up a nationalist-oriented educational system is discussed in Reeva S. Simon, Iraq Between the Two World Wars: Creation and Implementation of a Nationalist Ideology (New York, 1986).

A detailed political history treating the period from the revolution to the 1990s, with considerable attention paid to the Saddam Husayn regime, is Marion Farouk-Sluglett and Peter Sluglett, Iraq Since 1958: From Revolution to Dictatorship, 3rd rev. ed. (London, 2001). A very well-researched examination of the inner workings of Husayn's regime is provided by Joseph Sassoon, Saddam Hussein's Ba'th Party: Inside an Authoritarian Regime (Cambridge, 2011), while an effectively illustrated study of the Ba'thist regime's attempts to use the pre-Islamic past to create a unifying secular culture is Amatzia Baram, Culture, History, and Ideology in the Formation of Ba'thist Iraq, 1968–1989 (New York, 1989). Samir al-Khalil, Republic of Fear: Saddam's Iraq (Berkeley, 1989), gained wide acclaim during the 1991 Gulf War, in large measure because it portrayed the Iraqi regime the way the US public and administration wanted to see it. The most satisfactory work on the Iran-Iraq War is Dilip Hiro, The Longest War: The Iran-Iraq Military Conflict, updated ed. (London, 1990).

Early accounts of Iraq's invasion of Kuwait and the resulting Gulf War include Lawrence Freedman and Efraim Karsh, The Gulf Conflict, 1990–1991: Diplomacy and War in the New World Order (Princeton, 1993); Dilip Hiro, Desert Shield to Desert Storm: The Second Gulf War (New York, 1992); and a book compiled by the staff of U.S. News and World Report titled Triumph Without Victory: The History of the Persian Gulf War (New York, 1993). The coverage in Middle East Report offers a stimulating alternative view to the explanations released by the Bush administration. Two excellent studies of the border disputes between Iraq and Kuwait are David H. Finnie, Shifting Lines in the Sand: Kuwait's Elusive Frontier with Iraq (Cambridge, MA, 1992), and Richard Schofield, Kuwait and Iraq: Historical Claims and Territorial Disputes, 2nd ed. (London, 1993).

An engaging account of the run-up to the 2003 US invasion is provided in George Packer's The Assassins' Gate: America in Iraq (New York, 2005), and the early phases of the invasion are discussed in Anthony Cordesman, The Iraq War: Strategy, Tactics and Military Lessons (Westport, 2003). A thorough analysis of the occupation is provided by Ali A. Allawi, The Occupation of Iraq: Winning the War, Losing the Peace (New Haven, 2007). Rajiv Chandrasekaran, a journalist based in Baghdad from 2003 to 2004, shares his observations of American bungling in Imperial Life in the Emerald City: Inside Iraq's Green Zone (New York, 2006), while Rory Stewart, a British official posted in southern Iraq, documents his experiences in The Prince of the Marshes: And Other Occupational Hazards of a Year in Iraq (Orlando, 2006). A useful on-the-ground account of ISIS is provided by journalist Patrick Cockburn, The Rise of the Islamic State: ISIS and the New Sunni Revolution (London, 2015).

JORDAN

Naseer H. Aruri, Jordan: A Study in Political Development (1921–1965) (The Hague, 1972), is a broadly based introductory study. Mary C. Wilson's King Abdullah, Britain, and the Making of Jordan (Cambridge, 1987) examines the development of the state through the personality and ambitions of its ruler, and Yoav Allon's The Making of Jordan: Tribes, Colonialism and the Modern State (London, 2007) assesses the role of tribes in the state-building process. Uriel Dann's King Hussein and the Challenge of Arab Radicalism: Jordan, 1955–1967 (New York, 1989) examines the crises generated by the spread of Nasserism. For an analysis of the transition from King Husayn's forty-six years of rule to the new regime of his son Abdullah II, see Curtis R. Ryan, Jordan in Transition: From Hussein to Abdullah (Boulder, 2002).

PALESTINE AND ISRAEL

Zionism and the Mandate Period

A basic collection of documents is contained in Walter Laqueur and Barry Rubin, eds., The Israel-Arab Reader: A Documentary History of the Middle East Conflict, 6th rev. ed. (New York, 2001). For the history of Zionism and the development of Zionist ideology, see Shlomo Avineri, The Making of Modern Zionism: The Intellectual Origins of the Jewish State (New York, 1981); Ben Halpern, The Idea of the Jewish State, 2nd ed. (Cambridge, MA, 1969); and Walter Laqueur, A History of Zionism (New York, 1972). A work that illuminates not only the life of its subject but also the history of political Zionism and the diplomacy of the mandate era is Jehuda Reinharz's excellent two-volume biography, Chaim Weizmann: The Making of a Zionist Leader (New York, 1985) and Chaim Weizmann: The Making of a Statesman (New York, 1993).

A comprehensive survey treating Palestine and Arab-Jewish relations from late Ottoman times is Charles D. Smith, Palestine and the Arab-Israeli Conflict, 6th ed. (New York, 2007). A more detailed but less focused survey is Mark Tessler, A History of the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict (Bloomington, 1994). A revisionist approach that views the practices of the first and second aliyahs within the framework of a colonial enterprise is Gershon Shafir, Land, Labor, and the Origins of the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict, 1882–1914, updated ed. (Berkeley, 1996). Specific studies of the mandate, with strong emphasis on British policymaking, include Bernard Wasserstein, The British in Palestine: The Mandatory Government and the Arab-Jewish Conflict, 1917–1929 (London, 1978), which explains the machinery of government, and Christopher Sykes, Cross Roads to Israel, reprint (Bloomington, 1978). Barbara J. Smith, The Roots of Separatism in Palestine: British Economic Policy, 1920–1929 (Syracuse, 1993), argues that Britain's economic policies facilitated the development of a separate Zionist economy as early as the 1920s. Zachary Lockman, Comrades and Enemies: Arab and Jewish Workers in Palestine, 1906–1948 (Berkeley, 1996), examines the ways in which the mandate-era Zionist labor establishment was shaped by its internal debate on how to deal with Palestinian Arab workers and their unions. The final years of the mandate are examined in Michael Cohen, Palestine, Retreat from the Mandate: The Making of British Policy, 1936–1945 (New York, 1978), and the same author's Palestine and the Great Powers (Princeton, 1982). The perspectives and policies of all the main participants are examined in Wm. Roger Louis and Robert W. Stookey, eds., The End of the Palestine Mandate (Austin, 1986). There is much that is still valuable in J. C. Hurewitz, The Struggle for Palestine, reprint (New York, 1968).

Among the works on the development of Zionist institutions during the mandate are Noah Lucas, The Modern History of Israel (London, 1974), and Dan Horowitz and Moshe Lissak, Origins of the Israeli Polity:

Palestine Under the Mandate (Chicago, 1978). The Jewish acquisition of land is examined in Kenneth W. Stein, The Land Question in Palestine, 1917–1939 (Chapel Hill, 1984). The thorny issue of population receives definitive treatment in Justin McCarthy, The Population of Palestine: Population History and Statistics of the Late Ottoman Period and the Mandate (New York, 1990). The rise of political activity among the Palestinian notables is analyzed in great detail in Yehoshua Porath's two studies, The Emergence of the Palestinian National Movement, 1918–1929 (London, 1973) and The Palestinian Arab National Movement, 1929–1939: From Riots to Rebellion (London, 1978). Philip Mattar, The Mufti of Jerusalem: Al-Hajj Amin al-Husayni and the Palestinian National Movement (New York, 1988), presents the mufti in the context of the politics of the notables. The emergence of Palestinian national identity is the subject of Muhammad Muslih, The Origins of Palestinian Nationalism (New York, 1990); Rashid Khalidi, Palestinian Identity: The Construction of Modern National Consciousness (New York, 1997); and Baruch Kimmerling and Joel S. Migdal, The Palestinian People: A History (Cambridge, MA, 2003), an updated version of an earlier work that now contains a lengthy section on the Oslo peace process. Khalidi's Iron Cage: The Story of the Palestinian Struggle for Statehood (Oxford, 2007) assesses the Palestinian failure to establish an independent state.

Israel and the Palestinians After 1948

In recent decades, a lively and occasionally acrimonious debate has swept through Israeli scholarly circles as a result of the work of a group of so-called new historians who have challenged some of the long-accepted historical assumptions about Zionism and the early years of the Israeli state. Their work and that of other like-minded revisionist scholars may be sampled in Michael N. Barnett, ed., Israel in Comparative Perspective: Challenging the Conventional Wisdom (Albany, 1996). Two critical reappraisals of Israel's role in the events surrounding the war of 1948 by leading representatives of the new history movement are Avi Shlaim, Collusion Across the Jordan: King Abdullah, the Zionist Movement, and the Partition of Palestine (New York, 1988), and Ilan Pappé, The Making of the Arab-Israeli Conflict, 1947–1951 (London, 1992). The contributors to Eugene Rogan and Avi Shlaim, eds., The War for Palestine: Rewriting the History of 1948, 2nd ed. (Cambridge, 2008), examine the role of the states participating in the conflict with the objective of distinguishing various national myths from historical reality. Meron Benvenisti's Sacred Landscape: The Buried History of the Holy Land Since 1948 (Berkeley, 2002) explains how the war and its aftermath transformed the Arab landscape. A revisionist interpretation of Israel's policy toward the Arab world from 1948 to 1998 is Avi Shlaim, The Iron Wall: Israel and the Arab World (New York, 2001); also, thirty of his essays have been reprinted in Avi Shlaim, Israel and Palestine: Reappraisals, Revisions, Refutations (London, 2009). A spirited refutation of the new historians' methods, evidence, and motives is found in Efraim Karsh, Fabricating Israeli History: The “New Historians” (London, 1997). Ilan Pappé examines the evolution of the dominant narratives of Zionism and their relation to changing political contexts in The Idea of Israel: A History of Power and Knowledge (London, 2014).

In addition to Lucas's The Modern History of Israel, cited above, Israeli political, social, and religious institutions are treated in Yossi Beilin, Israel: A Concise Political History (New York, 1992); Nadav Safran, Israel, the Embattled Ally (Cambridge, MA, 1981), a domestic history that nevertheless also emphasizes the development of the US-Israeli relationship; and Alan Dowty, The Jewish State: A Century Later (Berkeley, 1998), a combination thematic and chronological analysis of the challenges facing the evolving Israeli democracy from the mandate to the 1990s. Israeli politics leading up to the 1967 War is researched in detail in Tom Segev, 1967: Israel, the War, and the Year That Transformed the Middle East (New York, 2007). A good introduction to the workings of the Israeli electoral and political systems is Gregory S. Mahler, Israel: Government and Politics in a Maturing State (San Diego, 1990). A more critical approach to the US-Israeli relationship than Safran's is found in Cheryl A. Rubenberg, Israel and the American National Interest: A Critical Examination (Urbana, 1986), and John Mearsheimer and Stephen Walt, The Israel Lobby and U.S. Foreign Policy (New York, 2007). For the Palestinian community within Israel, see Ian S. Lustick, Arabs in the Jewish State: Israel's Control of a National Minority (Austin, 1980), which examines the system of controls Israel used to maintain the quiescence of its Arab citizens. Lustick has also examined the rise of militant Jewish settler groups with special emphasis on Gush Emunim in For the Land and the Lord: Jewish Fundamentalism in Israel (New York, 1988). Ilan Peleg, Begin's Foreign Policy, 1977–1983: Israel's Move to the Right (New York, 1987), is a critical interpretation of the role of the Right in influencing the Begin government's policies. Taking 1967 as their starting point, Dan Horowitz and Moshe Lissak examine twenty years of changes in Israel in Trouble in Utopia: The Overburdened Polity of Israel (Albany, 1989).

The reasons for the Palestinian exodus are carefully documented by Benny Morris, one of the new historians, in The Birth of the Palestinian Refugee Problem Revisited, 1947–1949, 2nd ed. (New York, 2004), which successfully refutes earlier explanations. The outstanding study of the PLO is Yezid Sayigh, Armed Struggle and the Search for a State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993 (Oxford, 1997). Also valuable is Helena Cobban, The Palestinian Liberation Organisation: People, Power, and Politics (Cambridge, 1984), and Emile Sahliyeh, In Search of Leadership: West Bank Politics Since 1967 (Washington, DC, 1988). For the onset and impact of the continued Israeli occupation, see Ahron Bregman, Cursed Victory: A History of Israel and the Occupied Territories (London, 2014). For Gaza in particular, see Sara Roy, The Gaza Strip: The Political Economy of De-Development (Washington, DC, 1995). On the Palestinian presence in Lebanon, see Rex Brynen, Sanctuary and Survival: The PLO in Lebanon (Boulder, 1990). An important study of politics and gender within the Palestinian community in Lebanon during the period 1968–1982 is Julie M. Peteet, Gender in Crisis: Women and the Palestinian Resistance Movement (New York, 1991).

A thorough study of the first intifada is F. Robert Hunter, The Palestinian Uprising: A War by Other Means, 2nd ed. (Berkeley, 1993), a work that is enhanced by the author's interviews with Palestinians during the early phase of the uprising. Joost R. Hiltermann, Behind the Intifada: Labor and Women's Movements in the Occupied Territories (Princeton, 1991), focuses on how the formation of trade unions and women's committees among Palestinians in the occupied territories contributed to the struggle for national liberation. A more recent account is Glenn E. Robinson, Building a Palestinian State: The Incomplete Revolution (Bloomington, 1997), which connects the rise of a new Palestinian elite during the intifada with Arafat's oppressive policies as head of the PA after 1994; Robinson's work also includes a useful analysis of Hamas. Additional studies of Hamas and other Palestinian Islamic activist organizations include Ziad Abu-Amr, Islamic Fundamentalism in the West Bank and Gaza: Muslim Brotherhood and Islamic Jihad (Bloomington, 1994); Sara Roy, Hamas and Civil Society in Gaza: Engaging the Islamist Social Sector (Princeton, 2011); and Shaul Mishal and Avraham Sela, The Palestinian Hamas (New York, 2000), which stresses the pragmatic nature of the organization. The Middle East reports of the International Crisis Group, available online, are consistently well informed and up to date, especially on the fragmentation of Palestinian politics.

A useful reference work for the period after Oslo I is Lawrence Joffe, Kessing's Guide to the Mid-East Peace Process (London, 1996), which reproduces the major documents, provides capsule biographies of the main participants, and offers an analysis of the peace process itself to mid-1996. Of the several studies that present the Oslo accords as a potential disaster for the Palestinians, Farsoun Samih and Christina Zacharia's Palestine and the Palestinians (Boulder, 1997) is recommended, as is Graham Usher, Palestine in Crisis: The Struggle for Peace and Political Independence After Oslo (London, 1995), and the study by Kimmerling and Migdal cited earlier. A more recent penetrating critique of the accords is Cheryl A. Rubenberg, The Palestinians: In Search of a Just Peace (Boulder, 2003). An account of the effects of the Oslo accords on the individual states of the region is Robert O. Freedman, ed., The Middle East and the Peace Process: The Impact of the Oslo Accords (Gainesville, FL, 1998). For an understanding of US policy during the rise and fall of the Oslo peace process, the chapters on the Clinton presidency in William B. Quandt, Peace Process: American Diplomacy and the Arab-Israeli Conflict Since 1967, rev. ed. (Washington, DC, and Berkeley, 2001), are must-reads. For the 2000 Camp David summit and the impact of its collapse, a useful starting point is Charles Enderlin's Shattered Dreams: The Failure of the Peace Process in the Middle East, 1995–2002 (New York, 2003). Personal accounts of Camp David have been written by many of the participants (for example, Shlomo Ben Ami, Gilead Sher, Akram Haniyeh, Robert Malley, Dennis Ross), and a valuable exchange of views took place in the New York Review of Books between 2001 and 2002. For a thoughtful reflection on the transformations on the ground, see Raja Shehadeh, Palestinian Walks: Forays into a Vanishing Landscape (New York, 2008).

THE STATES OF THE ARABIAN PENINSULA

The best starting point for a study of Britain's interaction with the Arabian Peninsula is the work of J. B. Kelly, Britain and the Persian Gulf, 1795–1880 (London, 1968), and Arabia, the Gulf, and the West (London, 1980). The latter book treats oil, diplomacy, and internal developments in the twentieth century with a concentration on the 1970s; it is written with a decidedly bipolar worldview. Britain's role in the Gulf is also treated in Busch's Britain and the Persian Gulf and Britain, India, and the Arabs, both cited above, and, more recently, in John C. Wilkinson, Arabia's Frontiers: The Story of Britain's Boundary Drawing in the Desert (London, 1991). For an analysis of the transition to American dominance, see F. Gregory Gause III, The International Relations of the Persian Gulf (Cambridge, 2010).

A solid study of the history of the Saudi state from its formation to the year 2000 is Madawi al-Rasheed, A History of Saudi Arabia, 2nd ed. (Cambridge, 2010), and her A Most Masculine State: Gender, Politics, and Religion in Saudi Arabia (Cambridge, 2013) is one of the most important contributions to understanding the complexity of gender relations in Saudi society. For the early history of the Saudi state, see Joseph Kostiner, The Making of Saudi Arabia, 1916–1936: From Chieftaincy to Monarchical State (New York, 1993). The ruling family is closely studied in David Holden and Richard Johns, The House of Saud: The Rise and Rule of the Most Powerful Dynasty in the Arab World (London, 1981). Nadav Safran, Saudi Arabia: The Ceaseless Quest for Security (Ithaca, 1988), concentrates on developments since 1970. Mordechai Abir, Saudi Arabia in the Oil Era: Regime and Elites, Conflict and Collaboration (Boulder, 1988), offers an important analysis of the administrative elite and the tensions created by their continued exclusion from decision making; Abir's sequel, Saudi Arabia: Government, Society, and the Gulf Crisis (New York, 1993), is an equally significant contribution. Toby Matthiesen, The Other Saudis:

Shiism, Dissent and Sectarianism (Cambridge, 2015), is a historical account of Shi'a politics in Saudi Arabia's eastern provinces, while Frederic Wehrey's Sectarian Politics in the Gulf: From the Iraq War to the Arab Uprisings (New York, 2014) is a well-researched comparative assessment of Sunni-Shi'a relations in Saudi Arabia, Bahrain, and Kuwait. The excellent work by F. Gregory Gause III, Oil Monarchies: Domestic and Security Challenges in the Arab Gulf States (New York, 1994), offers a comparative reinterpretation of the bases of politics in the six Gulf monarchies during the period immediately before and after the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait.

The most thorough history of Yemen is Paul Dresch's A History of Modern Yemen (Cambridge, 2001). See also Robert D. Burrowes, The Yemen Arab Republic: The Politics of Development, 1962–1986 (Boulder, 1987). For a discussion of the smaller states of the Persian Gulf, Richard F. Nyrop, ed., Persian Gulf States, 2nd ed. (Washington, DC, 1984), is a useful volume in the multidisciplinary Area Handbook series prepared by the American University. A good introductory survey is Rosemarie Said Zahlan, The Making of the Modern Gulf States: Kuwait, Bahrain, Qatar, the United Arab Emirates and Oman (London, 1989). More specific country studies include Jill Crystal, Oil and Politics in the Gulf: Rulers and Merchants in Kuwait and Qatar, updated ed. (Cambridge, 1995), and the same author's Kuwait: The Transformation of an Oil State (Boulder, 1992). Mary Ann Tétreault's Stories of Democracy: Politics and Society in Kuwait (New York, 2000) offers a series of stimulating essays on Kuwait's evolving political culture in the 1990s. On Oman, see John C. Wilkinson, The Imamate Tradition of Oman (Cambridge, 1987), and Carol J. Riphenburg, Oman: Political Development in a Changing World (Westport, CT, 1998), a comprehensive analysis of Omani political culture and the social and economic changes that have influenced it. The short history of the UAE is examined in Muhammad Morsy Abdullah, The United Arab Emirates: A Modern History (New York, 1978). For information on Qatar, see Rosemarie Said Zahlan, The Creation of Qatar (London, 1979).

A full and entertaining history of the petroleum industry is found in Daniel Yergin, The Prize: The Epic Quest for Oil, Money, and Power (New York, 1991). Studies that concentrate on the Middle East include Ian Skeet, OPEC: Twenty-Five Years of Prices and Politics (Cambridge, 1988); Joe Stork, Middle East Oil and the Energy Crisis (New York, 1975), a critical account of the policies of the companies and the consuming nations; and Timothy Mitchell, Carbon Democracy: Political Power in the Age of Oil (London, 2011), a challenging account of the complex relationships between oil and democracy.

IRAN

From the Safavids to the Rise of the Pahlavi Dynasty

An introduction to the Mongol and Safavid periods is David Morgan's succinct survey, Medieval Persia, 1040–1797 (London, 1988). For more detail and breadth on these eras, see the splendid work The Cambridge History of Iran, vol. 6 (Cambridge, 1986), edited by Peter Jackson and Laurence Lockhart. Another fine volume in this series, treating the political, diplomatic, economic, and cultural life of Iran from the fall of the Safavids to the revolution of 1979, is Peter Avery et al., eds., The Cambridge History of Iran, vol. 7 (Cambridge, 1991). Solid overviews of modern state building include Mehran Kamrava, The Political History of Modern Iran: From Tribalism to Theocracy (New York, 1992), and Ali Ansari, The Politics of Nationalism in Modern Iran (Cambridge, 2012).

A very good introduction to all of Iranian history, with an emphasis on the modern period, is Elton L. Daniel, The History of Iran (Westport, CT, 2001). Nikki R. Keddie's stimulating Modern Iran: Roots and Results of Revolution (New Haven, 2003) includes three updated chapters covering events from 1979 to the late 1990s. One of the most lucid and perceptive studies of any transforming Middle Eastern society is Ervand Abrahamian's Iran Between Two Revolutions (Princeton, 1982). Although the author concentrates on the twentieth century and the growth of the political Left, he provides insightful comments on the Qajar period and on modern Iran as a whole; I have drawn extensively from this book and recommend it highly. Abrahamian revisits the subject in A History of Modern Iran (Cambridge, 2008).

More specific studies of the Qajar era include Hamid Algar's work on the oppositional role of the ulama, Religion and State in Iran, 1785–1906

(Berkeley, 1969), and Abbas Amanat, Pivot of the Universe: Nasir al-Din Shah and the Iranian Monarchy, 1831–1896 (Berkeley, 1997), a critical study of the shah's traditional ruling style in a rapidly changing era. Ann K. S. Lambton, Landlord and Peasant in Persia: A Study of Land Tenure and Land Revenue Administration (London, 1953), is a pioneering study of rural conditions. Foreign policy is surveyed in Rouhollah Ramazani, The Foreign Policy of Iran: A Developing Nation in World Affairs, 1500–1941 (Charlottesville, VA, 1966), and F. Kazemzadeh, Russia and Britain in Persia, 1864–1914 (New Haven, 1968). Nikki Keddie's numerous contributions include a collection of essays, Modern Iran: Religion, Politics, and Society (London, 1980), and Religion and Rebellion in Iran: The Tobacco Protest of 1891–1892 (London, 1966). Vanessa Martin, Islam and Modernism: The Iranian Revolution of 1906 (Syracuse, 1989), studies the constitutional revolution.

From Reza Shah to the Islamic Republic

The reforms of the first Pahlavi ruler, Reza Shah, are studied in Amin Banani, The Modernization of Iran, 1921–1941 (Stanford, 1961). Shahrough Akhavi, Religion and Politics in Contemporary Iran: Clergy-State Relations in the Pahlavi Period (Albany, 1980), is an important examination of the religious institution and its survival during the reigns of two hostile rulers. On the development of an official ideology, see Richard W. Cottam, Nationalism in Iran, 2nd ed. (Pittsburgh, 1979). The domestic and international aspects of the Mosaddiq era are well covered in James A. Bill and Wm. Roger Lewis, eds., Mosaddiq, Iranian Nationalism, and Oil (Austin, 1988), and two important works—Mostafa Elm, Oil, Power, and Principle: Iran's Oil Nationalization and Its Aftermath (Syracuse, 1992), and Eric J. Hooglund, Land and Revolution in Iran, 1960–1980 (Austin, 1982)—deal with land reform policies and their consequences. Pahlavi foreign policy is the subject of Rouhollah K. Ramazani, Iran's Foreign Policy, 1941–1973 (Charlottesville, VA, 1975).

The Iranian revolution of 1978–1979 and its aftermath have been the subjects of numerous studies, and the list continues to grow; only a sampling can be noted here. The best political and social analysis of the revolutionary regime from 1979 to the mid-1980s is Shaul Bakhash, The Reign of the Ayatollahs: Iran and the Islamic Revolution (New York, 1986). See also Nikki Keddie and Eric Hooglund, eds., The Iranian Revolution and the Islamic Republic, 2nd ed. (Syracuse, 1986); Mohsen M. Milani, The Making of Iran's Islamic Revolution: From Monarchy to Islamic Republic, 2nd ed. (Boulder, 1994); Said Amir Arjomand, The Turban for the Crown: The Islamic Revolution in Iran (New York, 1988); and Ervand Abrahamian, Khomeinism: Essays on the Islamic Republic (Berkeley, 1993), a stimulating work that situates Khomeini and his ideas in the realm of populism rather than rigid fundamentalism. Parvin Paidar's Women in the Political Process in Twentieth Century Iran (Cambridge, 1995) is a challenging analysis of the links between gender and political process, with excellent sections on the Khomeini period. Eric Hooglund, ed., Twenty Years of Islamic Revolution: Political and Social Transition in Iran Since 1979 (Syracuse, 2002), is a solid collection of essays on domestic and foreign policy issues. One of the best studies of domestic politics and foreign policy since the death of Khomeini is David Menashri, Post-Revolutionary Politics in Iran: Religion, Society and Power (London, 2001). An outstanding and readily comprehensible study of contemporary Shi'a Islam is found in Roy Mottahedeh's evocative work, The Mantle of the Prophet: Religion and Politics in Iran (New York, 1985). For a collection of the writings of Khomeini, see the work translated and annotated by Hamid Algar, Islam and Revolution: Writings and Declarations of Imam Khomeini (Berkeley, 1981). The early foreign policy of the Islamic Republic is examined in Rouhollah K. Ramazani, Revolutionary Iran: Challenge and Response in the Middle East (Baltimore, 1986). For the post-Khomeini period, see Said Amr Arjomand, After Khomeini: Iran Under His Successors (Oxford, 2009). Critical assessments of US policy toward Iran are presented in James A. Bill, The Eagle and the Lion: The Tragedy of American-Iranian Relations (New Haven, 1988), and Richard W. Cottam, Iran and the United States: A Cold War Case Study (Pittsburgh, 1988).

INTERNATIONAL POLITICS DURING AND AFTER THE COLD WAR ERA

In addition to the country-specific studies listed above, a number of important works examine the interaction of external powers with the region as a whole. A very good introductory survey of US policy toward the Arab Middle East from the late 1940s to the early 1990s is Burton I. Kaufman, The Arab Middle East and the United States: Inter-Arab Rivalry and Superpower Diplomacy (New York, 1996). L. Carl Brown, ed., Diplomacy in the Middle East: The International Relations of Regional and Outside Powers (New York, 2003), examines the foundations of foreign policymaking among the core regional states as well as the Middle East policies of the United States, Britain, France, and Russia. The involvement of the United States and the USSR with various regional states is the subject of Fawaz A. Gerges, The Superpowers and the Middle East: Regional and International Politics, 1955–1967 (Boulder, 1994). David W. Lesch, 1979: The Year That Shaped the Middle East (Boulder, 2001), is a stimulating interpretation of the impact of three major domestic and international events of 1979 on the subsequent unfolding of Middle Eastern history. Of the several works that deal with the crises generated by the attacks of September 11, 2001, we recommend Shibley Telhami, The Stakes: America and the Middle East: The Consequences of Power and the Choice for Peace (Boulder, 2002), and Fred Halliday, Two Hours That Shook the World: September 11, 2001: Causes and Consequences (London, 2002).

Of the many good books that have already appeared on the subject of the 2011 Arab uprisings, Jean-Pierre Filiu's The Arab Revolution: Ten Lessons from the Democratic Uprising (Oxford, 2011); Marc Lynch's The Arab Uprisings: The Unfinished Revolutions of the New Middle East (New York, 2012); and Jason Brownlee, Tarek Masoud, and Andrew Reynolds, The Arab Spring: Pathways of Repression and Reform (Oxford, 2015), are especially helpful in identifying those developments likely to be of historical significance in the years to come. James Gelvin's The Arab Uprisings: What Everyone Needs to Know, 2nd ed. (Oxford, 2015) and Lin Noueihid and Alex Warren, The Battle for the Arab Spring: Revolution, Counter-Revolution and the Making of a New Era (New Haven, 2012), are the most useful primers for undergraduate students. The collection of essays edited by Samir Khalaf and Roseanne Saad Khalaf, Arab Youth: Social Mobilisation in Times of Risk (London, 2011), offers valuable perspectives on the marginalized generation who sought to free themselves from those regimes.

INTELLECTUAL AND RELIGIOUS DEVELOPMENTS

A list of overviews of the history of ideas in the Arab provinces and Egypt during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries must begin with Hourani, Arabic Thought in the Liberal Age, 1789–1939, cited above. A fine study on the same subject is Majid Khadduri, Political Trends in the Arab World: The Role of Ideas and Ideals in Politics (Baltimore, 1970). An important study of the history and role of Arab journalism from its origins to 1945 is Ami Ayalon, The Press in the Arab Middle East: A History (New York, 1995). Sylvia G. Haim, ed., Arab Nationalism: An Anthology (Berkeley, 1962), includes translated selections from a variety of authors and a stimulating introductory essay by the editor. A sensitive and accessible discussion of the Arab nationalist phenomenon from its origins to its demise is Adeed Dawisha, Arab Nationalism in the Twentieth Century: From Triumph to Despair (Princeton, 2003). James Jankowski and Israel Gershoni, eds., Rethinking Nationalism in the Arab Middle East (New York, 1997), is a collection of essays that reexamines Arab nationalism in the light of recent theoretical studies on the subject of nationalism generally. Paul Salem, Bitter Legacy: Ideology and Politics in the Arab World (Syracuse, 1994), provides a critical reassessment of the dominant Arab ideologies from the turn of the twentieth century to the recent past and places them in a social and political context. William L. Cleveland, The Making of an Arab Nationalist: Ottomanism and Arabism in the Life and Thought of Sati al-Husri (Princeton, 1971), is an intellectual biography of the foremost theoretician of secular Pan-Arab nationalism. Cleveland's Islam Against the West: Shakib Arslan and the Campaign for Islamic Nationalism (Austin, 1985) examines the life and thought of an Arab activist who advocated the primacy of Islamic ties during the interwar era.

The Islamic resurgence has been the subject of numerous articles, monographs, and edited collections. Among the many edited works on the subject, John L. Esposito, ed., Islam and Development: Religion and Sociopolitical Change (Syracuse, 1980), contains several excellent essays that have stood the test of time, of which Michael Hudson's "Islam and Political Development" is worthy of special note. Nazih Ayubi, Political Islam: Religion and Politics in the Arab World (London, 1993), is an important work that combines an analysis of Islamic theory on religion, politics, and economics with six country-specific studies. In Islam and Democracy (New York, 1996), John L. Esposito and John O. Voll examine Islam as a social and political phenomenon and provide case studies from six countries, ranging from Algeria to Malaysia. Dale F. Eickelman and James Piscatori, an anthropologist and a political scientist, respectively, have written a stimulating comparative work, Muslim Politics (Princeton, 1996), that raises questions about ideological politics in various regional settings. A stimulating examination of the rise and, in the author's opinion, decline of political Islam from the 1970s through September 11, 2001, is Gilles Kepel, Jihad: The Trail of Political Islam, trans. Anthony Roberts (Cambridge, MA, 2002). Fawaz Gerges's well-researched The Far Enemy: Why Jihad Went Global (London, 2005) describes the complexity of the jihadist movement and charts its development from Egyptian and Saudi origins to a movement with a global orientation. A variety of country-specific studies and theoretical issues are raised in John L. Esposito, ed., Political Islam: Revolution, Radicalism, or Reform? (Boulder, 1997), a work that also has a comprehensive bibliography. Hamid Enayat, Modern Islamic Political Thought (Austin, 1982), and Emmanuel Sivan, Radical Islam: Medieval Theology and Modern Politics, 2nd ed. (New Haven, 1990), are sophisticated analyses. Samuel P. Huntington's controversial work, Clash of Civilizations and the Remaking of World Order (New York, 1996), posits a future confrontation between Islamic and Western civilizations. Huntington's premise, which first appeared in article format, is refuted in John L. Esposito, The Islamic Threat: Myth or Reality? 2nd ed. (New York, 1995), and in Emran Qureshi and Michael A. Sells, eds., The New Crusades: Constructing the Muslim Enemy (New York, 2003). A more recent review of Western perceptions of Islam can be found in Zachary Lockman, Contending Visions of the Middle East: The History and Politics of Orientalism, 2nd ed. (Cambridge, 2009).

Indigenous literature, including novels, can tell the historian much about a culture. The best starting point is the work of the Egyptian novelist Naguib Mahfouz, the first Arabic-language author to receive the Nobel Prize for literature (1988). Mahfouz's best-known work is the Cairo trilogy made up of Palace Walk, translated by William M. Hutchins and Olive E. Kenny (New York, 1990); Palace of Desire, translated by William M. Hutchins, Lorne M. Kenny, and Olive E. Kenny (New York, 1991); and Sugar Street, translated by William M. Hutchins and Angele B. Samaan (New York, 1992).
